"On the contrary, they are willing and able to imagine a new way of being Jewish for themselves, but it has to be in the right place, at the right time, geared to their needs and interests. I think Reviving Eden is exactly that right place at the right time."

Kovitz said the goal is "to create an inclusive opportunity for people to explore Judaism in their own generation, so they can go forward and build a strong Jewish community in Toronto."

People in her age group belong "to a demographic that has been overlooked," Gitterman said.

"This is when we create our own philosophy and ideas. If there is no guidance, instead of tending towards Judaism, we will get lost."

About 400 people turned out for Reviving Eden's initial program, which featured two bands, Bais Groove and Unclefty, at the Capitol Event Theatre.

Other programs have included a seminar on Jewish sexual ethics and a wine and cheese reception with Rabbi Goldstein, held before a community event sponsored by Kolel and the Miles S. Nadal Jewish Community Centre.

Upcoming events include a three-week course titled Finding Meaning in Your Work. Topics include exploring the career puzzle, examining personal style and ways to bring meaning to work, as well as Jewish thoughts on tzedakah and career.

In January 2003, Stone said, Reviving Eden is planning to take part in a Birthright Israel trip, in which the group will have its own bus. "We can customize the trip to accommodate the age group," he said.

For information on Reviving Eden, call Kolel at 416-485-7007.

Retirement fails to slow engineer

By BEN ROSE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Ben Etkin, who was Canada's first Jewish dean of engineering, is working on projects to improve our quality of life, almost 20 years after his official retirement.

Etkin, 83, is a member of an Environment Canada team studying the particles emitted in the exhaust of cars and trucks, so small they cannot be seen under a microscope. He is also doing research on geophysical prospecting – mapping rock structures by methods of experimental physics – from the air, using his specialized knowledge of how aircraft behave in turbulent weather. This will provide a cheaper way of finding of oil, gas or mineral deposits than methods currently used.

An expert in aerodynamics, Etkin retired from the U of T faculty of science and engineering in 1983 at the age of 65. He had already built a formidable reputation in his field, and was one of a group that, on short notice, gave advice on how to bring Apollo 13 back to earth safely in 1970.

"It was a Friday afternoon when we got a call," he said. "They wanted, in a few hours, recommendations on what range of pressure to apply to safely eject the lunar module and bring the Apollo astronauts to earth. They took our advice, and the rest is history."

Etkin dropped out of Oakwood Collegiate before graduation to take a job, but he later got his high school diploma at night school, with honours in mathematics and physics, a prerequisite for engineering.

But his goal was a career in aeronautic engineering, even though he entered university in 1937 during the Depression and friends advised him "that nobody will hire a Jewish engineer."

He was to become the first Jewish chair and later the first Jewish dean of science and engineering in the university's history.

During World War II and after, Etkin worked in the aircraft industry during the summer, assigned to projects that led to the building of the historic Canadian Avro Arrow. He helped design the Tiger Moth, the CF-100, the Harvard Trainer, the Avro Anson, the Mosquito and Lancaster bombers.

There was a special urgency in that period to produce planes for the war effort, and Etkin was among those who worked to solve the problems associated with components made in other countries, such as Swedish ball bearings.

Etkin began an association with Ben-Gurion University (BGU) in Israel after his retirement from U of T, when two of his former students became deans of their faculties in Israel. For a period, he was a member of the BGU board of governors and of a committee established to review BGU's science curriculum.

Though he does his research at his home in North York, he still has an office, which he visits about once a week, at the U of T Institute for Aerospace Studies on Dufferin Street south of Steeles Avenue.

He is endowing two medals in perpetuity, one a gold medal for a graduate student at the institute and another for a third-year undergraduate in engineering. His attitude to lifelong learning was summed up in his declaration to the audience at a recent meeting at the university: "I visualize knowledge as a finite domain embedded in an infinite sea of ignorance."

Smashnova nears tennis top 20

By ARIK LUBETZKY
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — At the end of last year, Israeli tennis star Anna Smashnova was at a crossroads in her career. A series of consecutive defeats saw her drop like a stone in the world rankings. At 25 – an advanced age for a female professional tennis player – there were plenty of reasons for her to call it a day.

Instead of retiring, Smashnova decided to take the bull by the horns. She upped her training regimen to a gruelling pace and concentrated on the strong aspects of her game – her gritty determination and excellent footwork. The results were not long in coming.

The first sign of success came at the Auckland WTA event in New Zealand in early January, when Smashnova won the tournament without dropping a set. She went on to win the following tournament in Canberra, Australia.

The success was tempered somewhat by an early exit at the Australian Open, but she picked up the pace again as the tour moved to balmy California, where she reached the quarterfinals of the event at Indian Wells. At the big event in Miami a week later, she reached the third round.

Her recent success at the German Open in Berlin, where she reached the semi-finals by beating current world No. 4 Kim Klijsters of Belgium before being knocked out by the eventual winner, Serena Williams, was embellished by a straight-sets win in the Italian Open in Rome over home player Adriana Sera-Zanetti 6-2, 6-1. That was followed by a tough meeting against Jelen Dokic of Yugoslavia.

Smashnova, who was born in the former Soviet Union, has moved into the top 30 and she is vying for entry into the top 20 (she is currently 24th). If so, that will close in on the all-time high ranking by an Israeli, which was achieved by Amos Mansdorf, who was ranked 18th in the ATP rankings in 1987 before finishing the year in 21st place.

Smashnova's surge can be attributed to her unwillingness to quit, a maturity of mind and a close personal relationship with her boyfriend and coach, Italian Claudio Pistolesi. All these factors have allowed her to play the best tennis of her life, free of the pressures of the past and complimented by years of experience.

Pistolesi, himself a former professional and Italian Davis Cup player, was Monica Seles' coach.

He and Smashnova met in Tokyo in 2000 when Smashnova's career was at one of its frequent lows. The meeting between the two was the turning point in the Smashnova's life. The loneliness and the stress, a regular part of her touring life, were replaced with optimism and a rekindled vivacious attitude toward tennis.

Pistolesi says the change has come about because of Smashnova's hard work and minor adjustments to various aspects of her game, such as footwork and improvement in her relatively weak serve.

A change of racket has also made a difference and Pistolesi thinks his charge can improve even further, although every step becomes more difficult as the competition gets tougher.

Israel's Davis Cup men's coach and captain of the women's Federation Cup team, Oded Yaakov, was largely responsible for the linkup between Smashnova and Pistolesi. As one of the people who has known her best over her years in Israel, Yaakov pushed Smashnova to persevere despite the drop in her form.

Yaakov says he told Smashnova not to quit as long as she was earning a living on the tour, and last year, when she returned home to her family in Herzliyah from an intensive training camp, he saw a great change.

The improved form soon manifested itself in the results, and it also aided Israel's Federation Cup team which last month earned the right to play off against the United States for a place in the World Group, the elite 16-nation division of women's tennis.

At 5 feet, 2 inches tall, Smashnova – who was always slight of stature in comparison to her colleagues on the tour – is at a great disadvantage.

Men's tennis entered a new world with the introduction of the power game when Boris Becker entered the fray in the mid-1980s. In the past five years, a similar situation has developed in the women's game, as big serving and big hitting has begun to be a dominant factor among almost all the top players.

Smashnova is at a disadvantage against power players such as the Williams sisters, Jennifer Capriati or Lindsay Davenport. But what she lacks in strength and a weak serve, Smashnova tries to make up for with exceptional footwork and movement around the court and great accuracy from the baseline.

"Anna is like a moving wall, she gets every ball back," says Yaakov.

Smashnova will face several challenges in the coming weeks and months.

She is currently competing in the French Open, which runs until June 9, as the first Israeli ever to be seeded in a Grand Slam event (21st).

Afterward she will move on to the brief grass court part of the tour in England at various tournaments that culminate at Wimbledon.

In July, Smashnova will lead Israel's Federation Cup team against the United States on U.S. soil, where the Israelis are complete no-hopers, but her matches of late have provided much drama and excitement, and she is earning a name for herself on the world stage.

Unfortunately, there has been very little TV coverage of Smashnova's matches and one of the great sporting success stories in Israel this year is going almost unnoticed at home.

Parrish: a thought

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

It's official: the Hon. Carolyn Parrish, Liberal member of Parliament for Mississauga Centre, member of the Standing Committee on Health, member of the Standing Committee on Procedures and House Affairs, chair of the NATO parliamentary association, former writer and teacher, is breathtakingly naive.

And her naiveté, expressed in her recent remarks about Israel on her Palestinian-sponsored trip to the region, works on so many levels.

For starters, it should be noted that Palestine House, sponsor of the trip for nine MPs to the Palestinian territories, is in Parrish's riding. It seems to have found, in the august member, a perfect, if painfully inarticulate, mouthpiece. A few weeks ago, Parrish's colleague, Toronto MP Joe Volpe, warned that participants on this trip would be used as propaganda pawns of the Palestinians. He wasn't far off.

Our doe-eyed Parrish, who sounds as though she's never been east of Scarborough, tells the Toronto Star (naturally) that it hadn't taken her long to figure out who the underdog is in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. After all of two days of talks and a brief tour of the West Bank, Parrish said she's convinced that Israel has "trounced" the human dignity of Palestinians with its military might.

"It's a very sad thing that a big, tough, strong and amazing people like the Israelis can, with a fairly cold shoulder, treat these [Palestinian] people so badly," the intrepid MP boldly asserted. Thanks for the simplistic David-and-Goliath analogy, but when human bombs blow pregnant women, senior citizens and children to smithereens at a Passover seder, or transform those armed and dangerous billiards players into fine, pink mists, or when a five-year-old can be murdered in her own bed, all bets are off.

Memo to Ms. Parrish: The Palestinian people, and only they, are responsible for being treated "so badly." It is their own venal and pathetic leadership they have to blame for their misery. It is the barbarism of the militants they support, often openly, that has led them to this sad place. It is their one missed opportunity for peace after another that has resulted in this human tragedy.

Touring Jerusalem's downtown Zion Square, Parrish reacts with child-like innocence: "There's definitely a tension in the air." (Tension? In Israel?) "It overwhelmed me that there could be a bomber right there." Yes, Israel's reality can be overwhelming.

And later: "I think the Israelis are coming down very, very hard on a large part of a very vulnerable population for the crimes of a very few... It's very tough not to feel very sorry for the underdog." Very.

It all sounds like the punchline to a dumb blonde joke.

The worst thing Parrish witnessed? Palestinian women with babies in their arms forced to take long detours around Israeli military roadblocks. The horror. The mind boggles as to how Parrish would react to seeing human innards splattered on the walls of a freshly-bombed pizza parlour.

And in an analytical coup-de-grace, Parrish went on to draw an utterly baffling comparison, saying Israel, the size of Lake Ontario, spends as much on its military as Canada. What her point is, I don't know, but it's not true: Canada spends $9 billion a year on defence, and Israel, $9 billion American. The comparison further falls apart when one considers that Canada's defence expenditure comes to 1.3 per cent of its gross domestic product (and results, as we have seen recently, in the purchase of used, dented submarines), while Israel's is a burdensome 10 per cent (and worth every penny).

Memo, part II: Canada is at peace. Israel has never known a second's peace.

As Parrish might say, whatever.

The horse that ran for Jewish education

Seymour Epstein

Very few people have heard of the Saul S. Wagman Fund for Jewish Education, but each year several hundred thousand dollars are generated by this fund and dedicated to the Jewish educational needs of the Toronto community.

In 1980, two respected members of our community, Sam Gotfrid and Ronnie Appleby (this year's co-chair of the 2003 Israel Emergency Campaign) assisted Saul Wagman with his estate planning and convinced him to leave a considerable legacy to Jewish schooling. When Wagman died in 1989, his executors, Gotfrid and Appleby were surprised to learn that a thoroughbred race horse was among his assets.

The plan was to sell the horse as soon as possible in order to settle the estate. The horse's trainer, however, wanted to run the horse in one last race. The executors agreed, and (as Dave Barry says, I'm not making this up!) the horse won. As a consequence, its sale price increased considerably.

The estate of Saul S. Wagman was made that much richer, and ever since, Toronto Jewish education has been the recipient of annual funding in perpetuity.

These funds have been used, inter alia, to enhance teacher training, to create Israel-based programs, to provide more Hebrew language instruction and to fund much-needed research.

There are, of course, two lessons in this story. First, a legacy donation to Jewish education is a long-term investment in the quality of Jewish life. We are, as a people and a religion, completely dependent on our ability to transmit the richness of our heritage from one generation to the next. Second, even a horse can be motivated by a great cause!

I see the makings of a great children's book...

Epi (Seymour Epstein) is the vice-president of Jewish Education at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Missionaries lose menorah logo battle

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Chosen People Ministries (CPM), a Jews-for-Jesus type group, is not entitled to use a menorah as a legally protected logo, the Federal Court of Canada has ruled.

Last week's ruling against CPM, whose 100 or so followers in Toronto and Montreal hold Jesus to be the Jewish messiah, reverses a decision by Canada's Registrar of Trademarks that granted the group's semi-circular menorah official mark status in 1999.

"The menorah is a distinctly Jewish symbol. According to the Jewish Bible, the menorah... was given to the Jewish people by God himself," the court found.

Canadian Jewish Congress went to court last month to seek a judicial review of the registrar's decision. It argued that allowing a group whose views are antithetical to Judaism, and which targets Jews for conversion, to use a menorah as a protected symbol would be "scandalous and immoral."

Official mark status, which offers protection that is superior to a trademark, would have permitted CPM to use its menorah on all its wares and services and potentially prevented others from using the same or a similar symbol for commercial purposes. Congress was pleased with the Federal Court ruling.

AN IMPORTANT ANNIVERSARY: 35 years ago, Israel fought and won the Six Day War. Perhaps more than any other, this photo by David Rubinger has become associated with that war. In this week's issue we recall and commemorate that historic event. For related coverage please see pages 4, 8 and 9.

Israel's eye in the sky

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Analysis

Israel's independent intelligence capabilities to locate long-distance threats was raised a notch last week when the advanced cameras and sensors aboard the newly launched Ofek 5 spy satellite began to operate. This capability is particularly important at a time when countries such as Iran are developing long-range missiles and unconventional weapons.

Ofek 5 launch

Above all else what stands out in comparison to the Ofek 3 satellite, which supplied important information from April 1995 to the end of 1999, is Ofek 5's new camera. The camera was developed in Rehovot at El-Op and constitutes an important technological achievement for the Israeli defence industry.

The satellite itself was built by Mabat and the launch rocket that sent the satellite into orbit was built by Malam, both of which are divisions of Israel Aircraft Industries.

Not all the details of the new camera can be published, but the main advancement compared to the previous satellite's camera is in its resolution, which is considered high even in relation to cameras aboard state-of-the art French satellites.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Chair in Israel Studies

CALGARY — A new chair in Israeli studies has been established at the University of Calgary. Endowed by the Kahanoff Foundation, which funds a variety of projects in Canada and Israel, the chair, within the university's social science faculty, will promote understanding of Israeli society and culture. Officials hope the position will be filled by next July.

ISRAEL

Extremists Charged

JERUSALEM — Three Israeli extremists have been charged with attempting to carry out an attack on an Arab girls' school in eastern Jerusalem. The three, all residents of the settlement of Bat Ayin, are suspected of belonging to a Jewish terror cell. Meantime, a leader of the outlawed Kach movement, Noam Federman, was charged last week with supplying the cell with explosives. A fifth Israeli was expected to be indicted in coming days.

Barak Scandal

JERUSALEM — Israeli police have recommended filing charges against four advisers to former prime minister Ehud Barak for alleged campaign finance violations. The four are suspected of illegally setting up fictitious nonprofit organizations to channel funds raised abroad for Barak's 1999 election bid. The police did not recommend charging Barak and recommended the case against him be closed. The four charged are former cabinet secretary Yitzhak Herzog, campaign manager Tal Zilberstein, Barak's brother-in-law Doron Cohen and Labour MK Wiezman Shiri.

Water Crisis

JERUSALEM — An Israeli panel has recommended declaring a "state of water emergency" for the next two years. The recommendations were contained in a 300-page report on Israel's growing water crisis. Other recommendations included moving responsibility for the nation's water to the Prime Minister's Office and establishing an independent water authority.

WORLD

Another Mistrial

PITTSBURGH — A mistrial has been declared in the case of a murdered Canadian rabbi. A jury could not decide whether Steven Tielsch killed Rabbi Neal Rosenblum of Toronto as he left a Pittsburgh synagogue in 1986. The May 23 deadlock was the third mistrial in the case. Several of Tielsch's former cellmates said he had made anti-Semitic comments and bragged that he killed Rabbi Rosenblum, who had been visiting Pittsburgh to spend Passover with his in-laws when he was shot by a stranger in what appeared to be a random thrill-killing. It is unclear whether the case will be tried again.

Cannes Do

CANNES — A Holocaust-themed film has won the Palme D'Or at the Cannes Film Festival. The Pianist, directed by Roman Polanski, is based on the memoirs of Wladislaw Szpilman, a Jewish musician who survived World War II in the Warsaw Ghetto. Judges awarded the festival's Jury Prize to Divine Intervention, an absurdist look at Palestinian life.

Chassid Sentenced

NEW YORK — A man who illegally diverted funds to a chassidic community in New York has been sentenced to six years in jail. Chaim Berger, 76, was also ordered to pay more than $11 million (US) for devising a scheme to illegally obtain millions of dollars in government funds. Berger, who apologized in court, had fled to Israel and fought extradition for three years before returning to the United States to face charges. Before leaving office, former U.S. president Bill Clinton reduced the sentences of four other leaders of the chassidic community of New Square, N.Y., who had been convicted for participation in the scheme.

New Synagogue

BERLIN — A new synagogue was inaugurated last week in the eastern German city of Chemnitz. The building replaces a synagogue destroyed by the Nazis. It also houses a library and centre for the city's 500-member Jewish community.

Jerusalem, We Have a Problem

LONDON — Col. Ilan Ramon, who will become the first Israeli to leave Earth as part of the crew of the space shuttle Columbia in July, has asked an out-of-this-world question: How – or more precisely, when – does one observe the Sabbath in space?

Ramon will orbit the Earth every 90 minutes, with each orbit counting technically as a day because from his perspective, the sun will rise and set.

Ramon has asked his local rabbi in Florida, Zvi Konikov, for guidance. The rabbi, in turn, has consulted rabbinical scholars across the world.

"We are told to observe Shabbat every seventh day, but if you are orbiting the Earth every 90 minutes, do you do it every seventh orbit?" Rabbi Konikov wondered.

One scholar has already ruled that Ramon should be relieved of his obligations because he will not be experiencing Earth time.

However, another rabbi disagreed.

"My view is that, as you can't exist in space without recreating Earth-like conditions – using oxygen, for example – you should observe the same routine as you would on Earth," responded Rabbi Jonathan Romain.

Threat from radical Islam here to stay: expert

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Steven Emerson has been studying Islamic terrorism for years, he's had more than his share of death threats and he now believes he has come upon a surefire – if unorthodox – method of determining just when the threat from Muslim radicalism will be over.

The danger will recede when "an Islamic reformation" takes place and "when we see a lot of Islamic comedians with the ability to poke fun at themselves," Emerson said last week.

But, he added, don't count on that happening anytime soon: "At no point in your lives will you say the war is over. Certain rounds may be over."

Emerson offered that rather bleak assessment at a media briefing last week that was part of a lengthy day of appearances and meetings organized by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. Emerson later served as keynote speaker at a UJA Federation dinner for leading donors.

A consultant on terrorism for NBC TV, Emerson is also author of American Jihad: The Terrorists Living Among Us and producer of an award-winning television documentary, Jihad in America. He also serves as executive director of the Washington D.C.-based Investigative Project, an intelligence and data-gathering centre on militant Islamic activities, and he has briefed the U.S. Congress on radical Islam.

Emerson has also come under fire from Muslim groups, which accuse him of an anti-Islamic bias. Responding to his critics, National Public Radio (NPR), a publicly funded U.S. network, banned Emerson.

Canada is far from immune to the penetration of dangerous Islamic groups, Emerson told a small group of reporters. Egyptian Islamic Jihad, Al Qaeda, Hamas, the Algerian Armed Islamic Group and the International Islamic Relief Organization have all operated in Canada, he said.

Canada's Jewish community ought to be particularly concerned about the presence of these organizations. "I think the Jewish com-

'A pathos hard to bear'

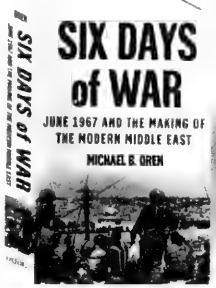
Nineteen years after Israel survived the attempts of five Arab armies to destroy it at its birth, Israel once again was fighting for its life.

The war would be recorded in history as the Six Day War.

Thirty-five years later, some historians debate the national, military, political and even theological aspects of that war. But what they never debate is the sense of total apprehension and woe that gripped the Jewish world in the wake of the military manoeuvring of Israel's neighbouring Arab armies and the bloodcurdling cries by Arab masses and political leaders for the annihilation of the Jewish state.

From the editor's desk

Thirty-five years later, it is important that we recall the days that led to Israel's decision to fight back and to those fateful six days in which the defence forces of the Jewish state did fight back.



One of the Israelis who was at the centre of events then was Abba Eban, Israel's foreign minister at the time. In his autobiography, he recorded the following: "Once we voted [on June 4, to allow the defence minister, in consultation with the prime minister, to resist the Egyptian aggression], we knew that we had expressed our people's will, for amid the alarms and fears of mid-May, our nation gave birth to new impulses within itself. All the conditions which divide us from each other and give our society a deceptive air of fragmentation, all the deeply rooted Jewish recalcitrance toward authority, now seemed to have been transmuted into a new metal which few of us had felt before.

"There had, of course, been some fear, as was natural for a people which had endured unendurable things. Many in the world were afraid that a great massacre was sweeping down upon us. And in many places in Israel there was talk of Auschwitz and Maidanek. The anxiety expressed by friends outside told us that our apprehension was not vain. Yet, as the last days of May were passing into the haze of memory, the people were gripped by a spirit of union and resolve. Men of military age silently laid down their work in factory, office and farm, took up their files of reservist papers and disappeared toward the south.

"Hospital beds by the hundreds were made ready with a quiet and almost macabre efficiency. Trenches and shelters had been dug all over the land. Industrialists, noted in better days for their hard-headed thrift, donated legendary sums for the national defense. As the days of suspense rolled on, the radio brought touching messages exchanged between soldiers at the front and their young wives at home. There were homely references to children about to be born, or anxious allusions to the oven having been left burning in the haste of departure. The simplicity of these exchanges held a pathos hard to bear. There had been a sudden rearrangement of values with human affections rising to the top.

"On Monday, June 5, I awakened early... The morning heat [in Tel Aviv] lay heavy on the streets. At seven-fifty, while I was driving the short distance to the Ministry of Defense, the air-raid sirens set up an unfamiliar howl. Men and women going to work and children hurrying to their schools gave no immediate attention to the sound. Only when policemen began to move tensely among them did they sense that something more was afoot than the familiar testing of the warning system...

"The action to which Nasser had been goading us for three intolerable weeks had now erupted. Israel was hitting back."

To better recall and understand those eventful days in May and June 1967, I recommend the recently published Six Days of War by Michael B. Oren.

Oren's book is a work of history but reads, at times, like a political thriller. It features a crisp, uncluttered narrative, carefully assembled archival detail and a steady, relentlessly pounding pace of real-life tension and drama.

The content is arranged chronologically and flows like a river, inexorably gaining momentum and force as the story moves along, until, with the description of the first day of the war, it surges over the dam of controlled emotion.

"It started at 7:10 in the morning, Israel time, when 16 Magister Fouga jets... took off from the airfield at Hatzor...

"By 7:30, close to 200 planes were aloft. With them went the orders issued that morning by Air Force Commander Motti Hod: 'The spirit of Israel's heroes accompany us to battle... Fly soar at the enemy, destroy him and scatter him throughout the desert so that Israel may live, secure in its land, for generations."

Oren, currently a senior fellow at the Shalem Center in Jerusalem, is well qualified to write about his subject in light of his expertise on Middle Eastern history and diplomatic affairs.

His use of archival material is masterful, bringing to life from the authentic pages of the historical record voluminous references from the many key conversations, meetings and debates that engaged the vastly diverse panoply of the central figures of the crisis.

Apart from those people who also see the hand of God sweeping through the affairs of mankind, Oren poignantly reminds us how the far-reaching, even epochal events of history are, after all, the results of decisions by individuals so human, so frail, so fallible and so great.

Israel Emergency Campaign Report

Emerson Offers Terrorism Update

International terrorism expert Steven Emerson, speaking to last week's UJA Federation Top Gifts Dinner, described Israel as the most scrutinized country on earth. "Israel is subjected to a double standard," he told a packed crowd of UJA Federation's leading donors.

While the world, he pointed out, criticizes Israel for checkpoints that slow down Palestinian travel, immigration delays from Mexico to the United States can sometimes last five hours. And, while Israel's battle against terrorism is subjected to condemnation, "not one decree," he said, "has been issued by Islamic clerics to say that martyrdom is prohibited."

"If we were to look at the odds of defeating Islamic terrorism," he warned, "it doesn't look good."

Ronnie Appleby, the chair of UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2003, with Howard Sokolowski, praised participants for their commitment to Israel. "You understand that Israel, but for the United States and the Jewish people is alone," he said. "Our entire community is emulating, through its generosity, Israel's remarkable capacity for optimism, despite the poison of suicide bombings," added Sokolowski.

Calling for Israel

The second round of telethons for UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2003 last week raised $1 million, bringing the value of increased gifts for Israel to $15 million out of a total of $40 million. Overall campaign gift increases exceed 60%.

All additional donations and new gifts will be designated for social services in Israel, which are under enormous financial pressure as the government shifts billions of dollars to defense and security.

Hundreds of volunteers, including students, seniors and professionals from across the community, came out to raise funds for Israel's emergency needs.

Come join us for next month's telethons, June 23-27. To help us show Israel how much you care, call 416.631.5692.

Leading Political Journalist Believes Israel Will Prevail

The will of the Israeli people is strong, and their desire to live is mightier than that of their enemies to die.

This was the message from David Makovsky, a leading political correspondent, recently addressing UJA Federation donors.

"One American official once pointed out to Arafat that more Palestinians are dying in this conflict than Israelis," said Makovsky. "Arafat shrugged his shoulders and said '1,000 martyrs or 10,000 martyrs – they're martyrs.' That's very different from the Israeli perspective."

Makovsky was one of several expert presenters at UJA Federation's Israel Emergency Speaker Series. Others were Middle East analyst Daniel Pipes, Ra'anan Gissin, a close advisor to Israeli Prime Minister Sharon, Israeli journalist David Horovitz and Middle East media commentator, Shira Herzog.

Gift increases to UJA Federation Emergency Campaign 2003 will be designated for the following needs in Israel:

- Assistance to victims of terror and their families
- Increased security for children in day cares, kindergartens and other facilities for children
- Increased medical and psychological support plus other human services for those most affected by the crisis, particularly the poor, the elderly and new immigrants

Terror victims help each other in Israel

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Sometimes we forget that terror victims in Israel are actual people whose lives have been changed forever, says the public relations director of a volunteer organization that helps terror victims and their families.

Sheina Carlebach Berkowitz, who is with the Israel-based Terror Victims Association (TVA), told the stories of some of those people at a recent breakfast meeting at the offices of B'nai Brith Canada, as part of a North American fund-raising tour.

Sheina Carlebach Berkowitz

Her organization (www.terrorvictims.com) was founded in Israel in 1986 by its current director Meir Indor, after he was stabbed and in a separate incident badly injured by a hand grenade. He placed a small newspaper ad to determine interest in a support group for people who'd been injured by Arabs and received hundreds of replies, Carlebach Berkowitz said. Today, she said, there is a mailing list of 3,000, with about 600 "regulars."

Most recently, TVA instituted a 24-hour hotline. Some callers don't know how to go about getting help from Israel's national insurance plan; others just want to talk or cry, Carlebach Berkowitz said. Some were injured themselves; others have family members who were wounded or killed.

An American teenager whose mother had spoken to Carlebach Berkowitz, witnessed a suicide bomb attack and couldn't speak for a year. "She wasn't physically damaged in any way…This is what we call the walking wounded. They make up about seven per cent of the hotline."

A native of Newark and grandmother of six who has lived in Israel for the past two years, Carlebach Berkowitz said the Israeli government helps terror victims financially, but they are still in pain emotionally and spiritually.

The organization, which has 10 staff and a corps of volunteers, all of whom have suffered from terrorism themselves, staff the hotline, take food and offer support to waiting families in hospital, and even babysit children on an emergency basis. There is no charge to the victims.

One volunteer and her husband are raising their own children and two younger grandchildren because their daughter and son-in-law were shot and killed about six years ago.

"They're the lucky ones," said Carlebach Berkowitz. "As of now, 13 couples have been murdered. It doesn't often work out that one set of grandparents gets to take care of the children, with no fights. In this case, the other grandparents live nearby and have access whenever they want." Often, TVA is involved in mediating family situations, she said.

A Machane Yehuda market stall owner, who was injured so severely in a suicide bomb attack that medical personnel thought he was dead, hopes to get to the point where he can help others too, said Carlebach Berkowitz. Although he's had 20 operations and faces at least one more, he says the nightmares are worse than any of the medical procedures, she reported.

"Israel has no time to mourn," she said. "We help [victims] get on with their lives and deal with this tragedy."

HELPING OUT ZAREINU: Bialik Hebrew Day School and the Bernard Betel Centre have been participating in an inter-generational program involving grade 8 students and seniors at the centre. As part of the program, participants created gift baskets with items donated by both the students and the seniors. These baskets were raffled off and the proceeds went to Zareinu Educational Centre. Seen here at the cheque presentation are (from left) Beverley Young, Bialik senior division coordinator; Shaindy Cohen Goldstein, Zareinu; Adina Strom, William Raskin, Daryl Gold, Zareinu.

Dry Bones
INDIA AND PAKISTAN HAVE PROVEN THE UNTHINKABLE!
THE WORLD COULD PLUNGE INTO NUCLEAR WAR...
WITHOUT THE STATE OF ISRAEL BEING INVOLVED!
DON'T WORRY THEY WON'T LEAVE US OUT.

An example for today

How unbelievable it must seem today to a generation and a half of Jews around the world! Yet 35 years ago, Israel's very existence seemed to hang in the balance. Through bluster, guile, malevolence, deceit and in the end, incompetence too, Egypt and Syria, egged on by their sponsor, the former Soviet Union, were poised to launch a war upon the Jewish state, the objective of which was "Israel's destruction."

Many of us old enough to have lived through those anxious days in May 1967 may have already forgotten the extent of the fear that gripped the Jewish world then. For time can dull even the sharpest of edges.

However, in the powerful book Six Days of War, Michael B. Oren reminds us how we felt then. "The scope and intensity of Egypt's buildup, together with the mobilization of virtually every Arab army, was observed with near-panic in Israel. 'We had seen photographs of the victims of Egyptian gas attacks in Yemen,' recalled Lt. Yossi Peled, a Holocaust survivor and future general... 'We had already started thinking in terms of annihilation, both national and personal."

After weeks of agonizing, failed diplomacy, the realization was inescapable that Israel stood alone among the nations. It would survive by dint only of its own arms, resources, will, courage and faith. Thus, on June 5, rather than await the deadly first blow from the Arab armies, Israel struck at its enemies. The war lasted six days.

No one expected so lightning swift a result; in truth, no one knew what to expect. And Israelis were not the only ones in "near panic." In the Diaspora, Jews mobilized resources in every conceivable way to help Israel. Oren writes: "The sole bright spot in these otherwise morbid preparations [for the impending war] was the unprecedented outpouring of sympathy from around the Jewish world. Volunteers arrived in numbers greater than Israel could absorb... and donations exceeded all forecasts... 'For the first time in history, European Jewry is acting as one for Israel. All moral, political and economic support is being mobilized,' French Jewish leader Edmund de Rothschild wrote [Israeli Finance Minister] Pinchas Sapir."

Thirty-five years after the Six Day War, Israel faces a new peril, more diabolical and sinister than the one it confronted on the fields of battle in those frantic June days in 1967. Fanatic, rabid Palestinian suicide bombers may not pose a strategic threat to the very existence of the state, but they are the vanguard of an uncompromising, hate-filled, extremist, anti-western, anti-democratic, supra-national Islamic force that includes the terrorist-supporting states of Iraq, Iran and Syria, which does indeed pose a strategic threat to the Jewish state.

Today, many Diaspora Jews hardly know of the dark void that Israel faced in 1967, nor of the way in which their grandparents, parents or older siblings responded at that precipice.

The streets of Israel today are virtually empty of Jewish tourists. Diaspora Jews, in effect, have joined in the boycott and in the isolation of the Jewish state that is the aim of Israel's enemies. We appear to have forgotten how to act as one for Israel, the example that was set for us so movingly 35 years ago.

Israel, Jews and the left

Jordy Cummings' recent commentary (CJN, May 23) was nothing but a list of excuses for the left wing group's hostility to Israel. Cummings – with the unbelievable chutzpah of comparing himself to Baruch Spinoza – fails in his thesis. While he prefaces his piece by stating that no one on the left questions Israel's right to a secure existence, the left's relentless criticism and blindness to the surrounding geopolitics of the region guarantees to keep Israel in existential danger. Cumming's pseudo-intellectualism is just empty words while violence as well as economic and diplomatic pressure are kept on that tiny promised land.

Anti-globalization, environmentalism, human rights and labour movements are noble causes, misguided or idealistic perhaps, but noble. Support for anti-Semites is not. By demonizing Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, Jordy Cummings justifies anti-Semitism and provides an excuse for Arab terrorism. It was Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat who destroyed the Oslo peace process, not Sharon. There could have been peace and so many lives saved on both sides if Arafat had accepted former prime minister Barak's offer of a peace settlement at Camp David over 18 months ago.

Over the past year, we have seen tremendous growth in anti-Semitism. Synagogues, Jewish cemeteries, schools and religious Jews in Europe and even Canada have become the object of more frequent attacks. The Ottawa Jewish community has just been warned of a possible assault on a synagogue or other Jewish institution this month. We hear of Arafat-appointed, Muslim religious leaders broadcasting on PA television: "They must be butchered and killed... Have no mercy on the Jews... Wherever you meet them, kill them." Arafat sends suicide bombers to kill innocent Israeli civilians in restaurants, shopping centres and at religious celebrations. The left does not notice or care. The "Jewish left" offers support to murderers of their own people. They are more concerned about "a tremendous growth of openly expressed Islamophobia and anti-Arab racism" than the anti-Semitism that is right before their eyes.

Jordy Cummings lives in a fantasy world. This is not Vietnam in the '60s. This is not 17th-century Amsterdam and Cummings is no Baruch Spinoza. We are not talking about a global corporate agenda; it has nothing to do with Enron. Israel and the five million Jews who live there are fighting for their survival. Perhaps some day Cummings' vision of utopia will come to pass. But the time is now and Israel needs the support of every Jew, left and right.

Thanks to Jordy Cummings for his Guest Voice column. He worries about the "knee-jerk" responses he may get; well, not all knees move the same way!

Cummings seems to be but one of a growing number of Jews in Montreal and elsewhere in North America and Israel who, because they are committed to non-violence and social justice and to a negotiated settlement of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, do not – and cannot – support the current policies of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and the Israeli government.

It is because of our deep commitment to human rights and to a sustainable peace that will ensure security and integrity for two separate and sovereign states that we condemn all acts of extremism and terror that harm innocent civilians; the latter can only move us away from a lasting solution that will ensure safety and dignity for all. And it is this commitment, one that reflects basic Jewish values, that infuses criticism of Sharon from the left and that turns away from war.

I hope The CJN will invite other guest voices to your pages so that we can maintain a dialogue within the Jewish community that parallels the current dialogues between Jewish and Palestinian women here and in Israel, dialogues that can lead to creative and supportive ways to make peace.

Sar-El volunteers unique

The deplorable isolation of Israel by the rest of the world, the increasing frequency of terrorist acts in Israel and the worldwide growth in anti-Semitism moved us to travel to Israel recently as part of a group of Canadian Sar-El volunteers for Israel. Sar-El recruits volunteers to relieve Israeli army reservists from duties that would require them to be away from home and job. Our group included 32 English-speaking volunteers from the United States, Norway, Germany, England and New Zealand.

Our tasks included the testing and maintenance of electronic communications equipment, baking, food preparation and refurbishing contents of army duffel bags. The soldiers we worked with voiced their appreciation again and again, not only for our help with these tasks, but also for just being there alongside them.

Especially meaningful was our participation in Yom Hazikaron ceremonies with the soldiers and huge contingents of volunteers from France and the former Soviet Union, followed immediately by Yom Ha'atzmaut festivities.

Israel needs our support. If not now, when?

Tragedy in the form of a bitter joke

When the United Nations was founded in 1945, it was assumed that it would be a staunch guardian of human rights. Unfortunately, the expectation has not been fulfilled. On more than one occasion, the organization's Commission on Human Rights (UNCHR) has pursued the opposite objective.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

This tragic reversal becomes evident when one looks at some of the commission's current member nations that are committed to all but human rights, especially in their own countries. To have nations like Cuba, Libya, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Syria and others like them sitting on the UNCHR as "guardians of human rights" is a sad contradiction in terms. Their inclusion as UNCHR members was once compared to describing an executioner as "a preserver of life." To say that may appear a bit strong, but it does convey a basic truth.

Human rights find their greatest support not in declarations and documents that speak highly of them, but in the way human rights are made part of the very structure of a nation. The bitter joke of having countries such as Sudan and Syria serving on the UNCHR means simply that these rights are not being taken seriously. Not surprisingly, therefore, there has been little progress in this most important area of safeguarding human rights as an essential building block of humanity's democratic future.

Alas, recent history has shown that there are nations that consider the restriction of human rights to be the best way to safeguard society – making it possible for a determined minority to rule it for its own purposes.

The commission's infamous World Conference Against Racism last year in Durban was ostensibly about human rights, but had it not been for alert and devoted defenders of truly human rights, the conference would have ended up as a tragedy in the form of a bitter joke.

There are, unfortunately, a number of influential nations that consider anti-Semitism and anti-Judaism to be proper building blocks of an ideal society. In their distorted view, Israel-bashing is the best way to build the future.

Fortunately, however, there are nations – Canada amongst them – that have no hesitation to call this policy what it is: destructive of human rights. We often criticize our own Canadian government for not being vigorous enough when Israel needs to be defended against international calumny. But, in a recent speech, Prime Minister Jean Chrétien spoke very warmly of "the enduring kinship between Canada and Israel, one enriched by unbreakable bonds of family, of shared values of freedom and democracy and of common causes."

Good for us!

Finding likeable people in the city

A few months back, I wrote a column inquiring about where the "nice Jewish males" were in Toronto. Much to my surprise and delight, my e-mail inbox was inundated with all sorts of responses. As a result, I feel compelled to report further and hopefully generate more responses... so here goes:

Darcie Richler in Halifax

I am pleased to advise that since the column appeared, I have come into contact with many nice Jewish males from Toronto (well, at least they claim to be). I was most impressed by their taking the initiative to e-mail me and being honest about who they were and what they were looking for.

Interestingly, most of these guys made similar comments towards the females of Toronto. They alleged, complained and insisted that the breed of the "nice Jewish girl" was all but extinct in the large city of T.O. The general theme was that the women of Toronto declare that they are looking for "nice guys," when in fact, they are seeking out the opposite.

It was almost embarrassing for me to read the observations made by some of these guys, as I knew exactly who they were talking about. For example, one gentleman stated that he is that nice Jewish boy that any girl should love to introduce to her family, but he is not often given a chance by most of the girls that he comes into contact with for a variety of reasons, one of which, he said, is his physical appearance. Another guy believed that Toronto girls do not share the same values that he does. And another rather poignantly asserted that the girls he has met, both at Jewish student events like Shabbat dinners or at bars, are just way too materialistic. The list went on and on.

(Of course, these men were all interested in meeting my fabulous female friends. Let me just repeat that I use a rigorous screening process before I play yente!)

I have a real problem making generalizations in situations like this. It is, however, quite difficult to solve such a conundrum when both sides make such blanket statements about members of the opposite sex. I will do my best to not do that.

But this is where things get a little unclear. I am confused, perplexed, and honestly, slightly amused. While I was slowly but surely assembling my "blue and white" pages of the nice Jewish guys of Toronto, I started thinking about who I could find for them. It makes me happy to know that these guys exist, and now I feel obligated to keep my word to introduce my friends to them. The only thing is, I wonder now whether my friends are the girls they were describing? I love my girlfriends, but could it be possible that they are seeking out the not-so-nice Jewish men? The thought has bothered me for the past few days.

I have come to the conclusion that my friends want and deserve the fantastic. They are looking for that person who is kind and sweet, but also charming and maybe a little mysterious. They are not willing to settle for anything less, and who can blame them – they deserve it. The question is, does he exist in Toronto? I still do not know.

As for the men, I am still not sold either way. I have seen the girls that you say you want to meet, yet you gravitate to something else. Do you know what you want?

So this is the deal. I want to hear more from both sides. Where are you rarities? I am so curious to really see how many of you are out there. Just to avoid any confusion, I am looking for the "nice Jewish singles" of Toronto (and surrounding areas, as something tells me that this inquiry goes beyond the borders of the GTA) who are looking to meet someone. The criteria for inclusion on my list, which would take pages to fully articulate, are, mainly: kindness, intelligence, honesty – and whether you are truly looking for someone with similar traits.

I am going to fill the gap in the soulmate search of Toronto. Consider me your ambassador, the mediator, the one who will find the middle ground. Please give me your input. You can e-mail me at drichler@is2.dal.ca.

History for the future

We all know the famous photograph of Israel, of the Kotel and the Dome of the Rock placed peacefully in the heart of Jerusalem. We all remember the pictures of the desolate stares of Holocaust survivors peering through barbed wire and we all have photo albums teeming with pictures of zaides, bubbies, parents and kids. These pictures share one common bond: Jewish history.

Bryan Borzykowski in Winnipeg

A very intriguing history of the Jewish people is compiled in a book written by Winnipeg author Allan Levine, called Scattered Among the Peoples: The Jewish Diaspora in Ten Portraits (McClelland & Stewart, 2002). Levine chronicles 10 eras in 10 cities in Jewish history, detailing the way the Jews in those communities lived and the way they were treated by the cities' other inhabitants. A famous quote, "To know where you're going is to know where you've been," rings true when it comes to looking at the history of the Jews, and readers of this book will understand with greater depth the challenges facing Jews today.

Levine writes about the Jews in Seville, during the Spanish Inquisition of 1492. He also writes about the Jews of Venice, 1516; the Jews of Constantinople, 1666; the Jews of Amsterdam, 1700; the Jews of Vienna, 1730; the Jews of St. Petersburg, 1881; the Dreyfus Affair in France in the 1890s; the Jews of New York, 1913; the Jews of Vilna, 1944; and the Jews of Kiev, 1967. The author describes the anti-Semitism Diaspora Jews faced during these times.

The story begins in Spain in 1492, where Jews were killed and forced to convert to Christianity. Even community leaders and sages such as Don Issac Abravanel (1437-1508), who had worked his way into the inner circle of some of the highest members of Spanish society, becoming financial adviser to King Ferdinand and Queen Isabella, were expelled along with the rest of the community.

By the end of the book, we see that Jews have long been favoured by royalty and government to carry out their business transactions, raise money for wars and participate in other commerce-related endeavours. But we also come to see a history of persecution, anti-Semitism and hatred toward the Jewish people.

It's interesting to apply what is happening now to what has happened in the past. There is a cycle in Jewish history that keeps repeating itself. In the "first" generation, you have practicing Jews. "Second" and "third" generation Jews practice less and less. While this does not apply to all Jews, it has been a general pattern throughout Jewish history. Jews have always tried to assimilate into the culture of their country, but as Levine shows, this assimilation often ended with "anti-anti-Semitism." For example, Levine writes about Jews in France in 1895, who considered themselves French people first and "Israelites" second. While they saw no difference between themselves and the larger society, others were not so accepting. The Dreyfuss Affair shook France and fuelled anti-Semitism, which disturbed and shocked many French Jews. It is these anti-Semitic events that bring the assimilated Jewish population to realize that they are Jewish and then the cycle begins again.

I am a part of that "third" generation. How many of your grandparents went to synagogue every week and kept kosher? I look at myself and my friends and can see how synagogue attendance and other Jewish traditions have fallen by the wayside. Then I read the paper and see synagogues being destroyed and I can't help but think back to the Jews of generations past who thought things were fine and that they always would be.

Yet the world today is different in some key ways. In the past, Jews had a tendency to shy away from bringing attention to anti-Semitic attacks in fear of adding fuel to an already scorching fire. Today, speaking out, holding rallies and supporting Israel is an important part of combating the world's increasingly anti-Semitic views.

Another obvious difference is that today Jews have a homeland that did not exist during previous anti-Semitic events and eras.

What we are facing now is not on the scale of the portraits that Levine writes about, but it is worth knowing what has happened in the past so we can be prepared for the future.

The Kirshner File

Hong Kong will mark a special centenary

One hundred years ago this month, Sir Jacob Sassoon, a wealthy Iraqi Jewish merchant who had made a fortune in Hong Kong, a British crown colony, was given pride of place in a ceremony that marked the Jewish community's coming of age. On June 9, 1902, Ohel Leah Synagogue, which had been named in honour of his mother, was officially dedicated. Sassoon had donated the land and had hired the architect. Now, finally, the Jews of Hong Kong had a synagogue.

Sheldon Kirshner in Hong Kong

Today the oldest shul in Hong Kong, Ohel Leah is an elegant, cream-coloured structure designated by the United Nations as a special heritage site, one of only two such buildings in this bustling, dynamic city. With its graceful exterior, marble floors, mahogany bimah and stained-glass windows, Ohel Leah, in Hong Kong's posh Mid-Levels district, is indeed an architectural marvel.

Later this week, on June 9, Ohel Leah will mark its centenary at festivities presided over by Yaakov Kermaier, an American who has been its rabbi for the past five years.

The synagogue, near Mosque Street, is located in a fairly spacious compound housing the Jewish Community Centre. It, in turn, accommodates an array of communal offices, a day school, two kosher restaurants, a kosher grocery store, a Judaica shop, a library, an indoor swimming pool and other recreational and social facilities.

When it was inaugurated a century ago, Ohel Leah stood on a lush hill surrounded by tropical gardens with a grand view of Hong Kong's impressive harbour, and served about 165 individuals, the vast majority of whom were Sephardim from the Middle East.

One hundred years on, Ohel Leah is hemmed in by a typical Hong Kong urban vista of high-rise apartments – the only affordable real estate here – and caters to a community whose size has since multiplied.

Jews have lived in Hong Kong since the early 1840s, when, with the imposition of the 155-year British colonial occupation, it was radically transformed from a sleepy fishing village into an international port, entrepot and financial centre. By the 1842 Treaty of Nanking, Britain took over the island of Hong Kong, an enclave in mainland China called Kowloon and some 235 islands in the South China Sea. In 1898, the British leased the New Territories, a large, fan-shaped parcel of land to the north. As a territorial unit, they formed the entity known as Hong Kong.

In July 1997, Britain ceded Hong Kong to the People's Republic of China. And in keeping with its "one country, two systems" policy, Hong Kong, with a population of 6.9 million, became a special administrative region of China.

Among the first Jews to stream into the region were the Sassoons – the Rothschilds of Southeast Asia – and the Kadoories, the Baghdadi family that would appropriate their title as the Sassoons faded into obscurity.

Now probably Hong Kong's most prominent Jewish family, the Kadoories are a formidable force, having developed the legendary Star Ferry, which links Hong Kong to Kowloon; the Peak Tram, which climbs to Hong Kong's highest mountain; the China Light & Power Company, which supplies residents with electricity; and the Hong Kong and Shanghai Hotels Ltd., which owns, among other properties, the five-star Peninsula Hotel, a landmark at the tip of Kowloon.

In addition, the Kadoories established agricultural schools in Mandate Palestine, one for Jews and another for Arabs.

Michael Kadoorie, born in 1941 and the family's current patriarch, is a trustee of Ohel Leah, a modern Orthodox synagogue and Hong Kong's only shul housed in permanent quarters.

Like all Jews here, the Kadoories hold foreign passports and are not citizens of China, according to Rabbi Kermaier, a 32-year-old graduate of Yeshiva University who resided in California, Maryland and Israel before arriving here with his wife.

"It seemed like a fascinating city," he explained.

Three-quarters of Hong Kong's Jews, whose numbers run anywhere from 2,000 to 5,000, depending on your source of information, are transients who can be expected to move on within about three to five years.

"They are mostly bankers and lawyers," said Rabbi Kermaier, the father of two young children.

The rest, such as the Kadoories, are permanent residents, with the right to vote in local elections and to apply for a Hong Kong travel document.

Some of the permanent residents have been here for well over 100 years. Shortly after his arrival, Rabbi Kermaier officiated at the funeral of Moselle Gatton, a native of Hong Kong who died at 101.

"We probably have the most diverse Jewish community in the world," he added. "We have Jews from the United States, Canada, Britain, Australia, Israel, Zaire, Zimbabwe, India, China, Afghanistan, Egypt, Italy, France, Denmark. You can be sitting around a Shabbat table with 10 people from eight different countries. They get on remarkably well."

But, he admitted, diversity can be problematic.

"Given the high turnover, our challenge is to maintain a sense of community and rootedness. It can be tough."

Eli Avidar, Israel's consul general in Hong Kong and adjacent Macau, claims there are something like 1,500 Israelis here, many of whom are representatives of Israeli hi-tech companies.

"Israelis blend into the Jewish community, unlike in some Diaspora communities," said Avidar, who headed Israel's mission in Doha, Qatar, before being posted to Hong Kong last year. "It's an extremely well organized community."

Eli Avidar

By his reckoning, Hong Kong's community is the largest in Southeast Asia, with the region's sole Jewish day school.

For decades, Hong Kong was the preserve primarily of Sephardim. But with the influx of Russian Jews after the 1917 Bolshevik Revolution and of German Jews after the rise of Adolf Hitler in 1933, the demographics gradually changed. By Rabbi Kermaier's estimate, three-quarters of the Jews living here today are Ashkenazim.

As elsewhere, the incidence of mixed marriage is quite high, and not surprisingly, most interfaith couples who belong to or identify with the community are members of the Reform congregation.

The community maintains good relations with the Hong Kong government, and if there is a general perception of Jews, it is a positive one, Rabbi Kermaier said. The Chinese generally regard Jews as smart and rich.

"It may be an anti-Semitic stereotype, but in Hong Kong it's a positive assessment," he observed.

Rabbi Yaakov Kermaier

Anti-Semitism, which is virtually non-existent here and alien to Chinese culture and history, is an imported phenomenon, usually propagated by Pakistani Muslims or Westerners.

Several years ago, the rabbi said, local teenage girls, buying into the latest fashion fad, sported T-shirts emblazoned with a swastika. They were definitely not making a bold political statement.

"It was a function of ignorance rather than support of neo-Nazism," said Rabbi Kermaier.

* * *

Israel has had a consulate in Hong Kong, the major gateway to China, since 1986. Israel used it, in part, to build bridges with China before the establishment of formal diplomatic relations in 1992. Since then, the Hong Kong consulate has been an invaluable facilitator of commerce.

Last year, Israel's volume of trade with Hong Kong reached the $2 billion (US) mark.

"Hong Kong is Israel's largest trade partner in Southeast Asia," said Avidar.

Upwards of 45 Israeli hi-tech firms maintain offices here, and in the past few years, Chinese entrepreneurs have invested some $2 billion (US) in Israel's hi-tech sector.

"Hong Kong will play a major role in southern China's economic development and, therefore, Israel will have a continuing interest in Hong Kong," said Avidar.

Jewish businessmen in Hong Kong, he elaborated, have factories in China, which produce goods ranging from jewelry to toys.

Attuned to the increasingly lucrative China market, El Al has two flights per week from Tel Aviv to Hong Kong. Yet El Al cannot depend on Hong Kong's booming tourist trade.

"There's very little of that," said Avidar, referring to the dearth of Hong Kong Chinese tourists to Israel.

Anne Roiphe on marriage: 'I do'

Married: A Fine Predicament*, by Anne Roiphe, Perseus Books, 2002, $37.95.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Cynics have always had a field-day with the notion of marriage. Heinrich Heine wrote, "The music at a wedding procession reminds me of the music of soldiers going into battle." George Bernard Shaw cautioned that it was most unwise for people in love to marry. A philosophical gambler lamented that marriage is a lottery in which if you lose, you can't tear up the ticket.

Such barbs, and others like them, seem directed at a moribund institution. Divorce is rampant, new life-styles abound, and astonishingly, one- third of babies in North America are now born out of wedlock.

But neither the critics, nor the baleful statistics deter Roiphe from a refreshingly optimistic outlook on marriage. Twice married, a mother of three, and a stepmother to two children, Roiphe approaches the slippery, sometimes messy, and always soul-shaping experience of marriage with deftness and grace. She rejects the notion that the institution is terminally ill.

Married offers a many sided, eloquent defence of married life from the wry perspective of one who survived the turbulent '50s and '60s, the sexual revolution and the feminist movement. Drawing on her experience – and the wisdom and suggestions of others – Roiphe explores such questions as the vagaries and pitfalls of romantic love; how setbacks and tribulations can bury a marriage; the need, if all else fails, for divorce; the joys and stresses of parenthood; the widespread nature of infidelity and something of its causes; and the roles of men and women in a rapidly changing society where the traditional rules of right and wrong no longer seem to apply.

For Roiphe, a marriage answers two basic human needs better than any other solution yet divined. In the first place, it can assuage loneliness. The twoness of marriage provides companionship through the years. None of our social organizations are able, or even seem interested, in providing emotional security.

It is disheartening to have the day begin and end without a helpful word from someone who knows what matters to you, without a caress from someone who knows what place on your spine needs rubbing and what part of your ego needs massaging.

Secondly, marriage creates the best workable arrangements in which to raise and nurture children. But, Roiphe confides, if parents are counting on children to bring them peace of mind, self-confidence or an unfailing sense of happiness, they are in for a bad shock. What children do is "complicate, implicate, give plot line to the story, colour to the picture."

The joys of parenthood are alloyed by concern and responsibility. Parenting can be a life sentence without parole. But the family unit, in the long run, is the nucleus of society and its constant hope for the future.

Are carefully arranged marriages such a bad idea? Roiphe gives them measured approval. She regards romantic love as a hydra-headed monster that should be approached with caution, which is exactly what is thrown to the wind when love enters. If free choice is the rule in affairs of the heart and considered the only legitimate reason for a marriage, then we endure all its ravages, its hidden meanings and its habit of so frequently savaging our happiness.

Filled with Roiphe's trademark blend of wit and sagacity, and replete with many references to Jewish tradition and practice, Married is bound to win widespread acceptance. Roiphe's response to the question, "Do you think marriage is worth it?" is a resounding "I do."

The art of the interview

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

It is a truism of family tree research that you can visit libraries and archives any time you like, but you must not delay interviewing elderly relatives as they will not be around forever.

The greatest regret of many genealogists is that they didn't ask the right questions of the right people at the right time. Tombstones often have stories to tell, but they're not nearly as articulate as people.

The interview is the first, and possibly the most important, stage of genealogical research. Good interviewing skills are essential to unlocking the secrets and mysteries on a family tree.

As a journalist, I've been conducting interviews for many years, but I have yet to find one good interviewing technique or formula that works in all situations.

The secret to a good interview is that there is no secret. Each one is different, and depends upon the person being interviewed.

In preparing for an interview, keep in mind the type of information you wish to acquire. Prepare for the interview by devising a list of questions.

The ideal subject is a raconteur with a sharp memory who is old enough to remember important family events of long ago.

Remember that a genealogical interview, especially with a new-found relative, can be an intense and even bewildering experience. Don't tire out an elderly relative by asking too many questions in one visit.

* * *

My great-aunt Sophie was 90 years old the first time I met her. She was the youngest and only remaining sibling in her family of 13 children. She admitted her memory wasn't good – she couldn't recall her own Hebrew name, for example, or list all of her siblings in chronological order – but she graciously attempted to answer my questions.

At first she couldn't tell me much about her father, who had died in 1929. I knew he had been born some place in Russia-Poland, but the earliest document I had for him pertained to his marriage in London in 1880.

I gave her copies of some old family photos, and she couldn't have been more grateful and delighted; she spoke as if they had helped her reconnect with a missing part of her soul. After that, the more we spoke about family matters, the more she seemed to remember.

"Dad came from Scotland, you know," she offered one day.

"Really? Are you certain?"

"Oh, yes. Dad was from Scotland. He told me so."

It emerged that she thought her father had been born in or around Warsaw and had gone to Glasgow as a child.

"He spoke with a Scottish accent, you know."

"Really? There was no Polish? No Russian?"

"Oh God no, nothing like that. He was very Scottish. He wore the Fraser tartan."

"You mean he wore a kilt?"

"Yes. Sometimes he did."

This amazed me and forever shattered my notion that my great-grandfather had been a typical Yiddish-speaking "Zaide" from Russia-Poland.

Over time, Sophie imparted numerous other genealogical nuggets to me that I could not possibly have acquired from anyone else. She died in 1997. I doubt there's another living soul anywhere who could have told me some of the things I learned from her.

She was a kind, graceful, soft-spoken lady who reminded me of my own dear grandmother. I'm so glad I had the opportunity to get to know her. I like to think that our conversations enriched both of our lives.

What you can do to help Israel

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

What can I do to help? As Jews watch the violence in Israel and the damage to the country's economy, we wonder what we can do to make a difference in the lives of Israelis.

As it turns out, we can do a lot.

The Internet provides you with a wealth of resources that allow you to reach out and help. McGill University professor Gil Troy, a regular contributor to these pages, recently wrote in the Wall Street Journal that helping Israeli victims of terror will send a crucial message, just as the massive outpouring of good wishes and money did in the aftermath of Sept. 11. "The message to the victims [of Sept. 11] was: 'You are not alone.' The message to the terrorists was: 'Your tactics are so barbaric, they obscure – and damage – whatever cause you were trying to advance.'"

Troy adds that "Support for the victims of these atrocities need not be political. Donating to the Israeli victims' fund does not have to constitute an endorsement of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon nor a rejection of Palestinian nationalism. It is the tactic – terrorism – and the idea – anti-Semitism – that must be repudiated." [http://www.walk4israel.com/index.cfm?fuseaction=article3]

Here is what you can do:

1) Help a victim of terror

One of the organizations that Troy praises is the Israel Emergency Solidarity Fund–One Family, which runs several programs to help victims of violence. The fund organizes walkathons, learn-a-thons and other fund-raising activities along with its Adopt-A-Family program. In that program, synagogues, schools or individuals outside of Israel are "twinned" with Israeli terror victims in order to provide them with long-term financial and emotional support. Foreign sponsors and Israeli families are matched according to such factors as need, knowledge of Hebrew and English and whether the foreign sponsors are planning to visit Israel. Beyond financial assistance, Adopt-A-Family encourages international friendship and understanding. You can read some moving case studies on their Web site [http://www.walk4israel.com/].

2) Stay informed

Many excellent Israeli news organizations provide extensive coverage in English of the latest events in the Middle East, including Ha'aretz [http://www.haaretzdaily.com], the Jerusalem Post [http://jpost.com] and Israeli radio and television [http://www.israelradio.org/english.html].

Honestreporting.com "monitors the international media for biased reports against Israel" [http://honestreporting.com/]. Visit the UJA's "Things You can do to Help Israel" page for links to media monitoring sites and for analysis of current events in the Middle East [http://www.ujc.org/content_display.html?ArticleID=37977]. Palestine Media Watch will give you insight into how the conflict is viewed from a Palestinian perspective [http://pmwatch.org/].

3) Send best wishes to an Israeli child in hospital

Soaringwords was created to be an online support network for sick children and their families [http://www.soaringwords.org/]. One section of the Web site is called "SoaringBridges to Israel" where children from abroad can submit artwork and messages which will be forwarded to decorate hospitals and schools in Israel. You can view samples of the gorgeous drawings on the Web site and read the inspiring messages of encouragement like this one:

"Hello friend, Let me introduce myself. I am a 9-year-old with a few hobbies such as rollerblading, bike riding, skateboarding, reading and playing baseball and football. How are you? I hope you feel better. How is Israel? Nice, right? Is it hot? I'm glad you are going to be okay. I've been to the hospital too. Best wishes.

"P.S. There will always be Israel."

Next time, I'll highlight more ways you can use the Web to help Israel.

The Sephardi kolel

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

A community kolel is an educational/religious institution. Unlike a yeshiva, it consists of married men, usually at least 10. As in a yeshiva, the men commit themselves to spend their entire days, from morning till evening, seven days a week, in advanced Torah study. The individual members bring with them extensive experience and background, in Torah study, teaching and communal work. In order to do this, they are given nominal financial support. The system is not unlike a university fellowship, in which fellows are paid to pursue their research and publish results.

It was in the early 1970s when the first community kolel, Kolel Avreichim, came to Toronto. Arguably, this was the beginning of a revolution, one that continues to this day. Certainly in those days, Orthodoxy existed in Toronto, but with nowhere near the level of sophistication – in terms of scope of choice, numbers, intensity and vibrancy – that it has today. The catalytic effect of importing a nucleus of a dozen rabbis and their families into the community cannot be overstated. Their mere presence challenged as much as it changed the status quo – from kashrut to education, standards were elevated. Organizations also changed for the better, but most notably people's lives changed.

Subsequently, there have been other kolelim. There have even been organizations, that, while having little resemblance to the conventional term, have nevertheless chosen to call themselves a kolel.

This spring, for the first time in Toronto, if not in all of Canada, a Sephardi kolel, Kollel Yismach Moshe, was inaugurated on Bathurst Street in the heart of the Jewish community. It distinguishes itself by its mandate to inspire the Sephardi community. Under the capable leadership of the Rosh Kolel Rabbi Eliyahou Attias, a compatible group of families were identified and invited to be its first members. Their level of commitment and calibre of scholarship had to be top notch. Furthermore, all of them had to be of Sephardi background, as well as fluent in English.

A kolel is open all day to those who are willing to consecrate set times, to make use of it as a resource library, or to attend regular classes. In fact, the understanding is that fellows should be available for study during the evening session. While a kolel is primarily a learning venue for men, classes are offered for women as well.

The very word kolel means "grouping" or "fellowship" in Hebrew. But the word kolel also means "inclusive," as if one is stating a hope or desire that through the Sephardi kolel, the Sephardi community as a whole will find unity of purpose in the study and observance of the mitzvot. Having said that, it must be emphasized that the kolel welcomes all, Sephardi or Ashkenazi – anyone wishing to delve into the classical sacred texts and discourses of learning.

The Sephardi kolel then, is not just one more organization, but rather one with the potential to alter all others in the realm of observance and Torah study.

Young journalist sees glimmers of peace in next generation

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Special to The CJN

When Naomi Lightman's editor asked the young journalist to cover a press conference in New York City hosted by Al-Haq, a Palestinian human rights organization, she was less than thrilled.

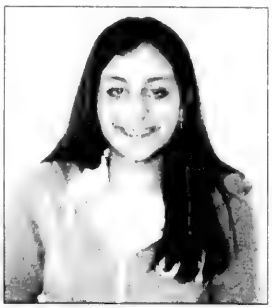
On May 7, the night before the Al-Haq event, a suicide bombing at a pool hall in Rishon Lezion killed 15 Israelis and injured about 60 others.

The 17-year-old Lightman, who says she has a strong Jewish identity, was upset by the attack.

"It was very emotional for me. I did not want to go," said Lightman, a Grade 11 student at Northern Secondary School.

But her pro-Palestinian assignment editor at Young People's Press (YPP), a Toronto-based organization that trains and works with young journalists, insisted that she attend. He said he wanted a story written from a different perspective and chose Lightman, who was doing a co-op term with YPP, specifically because she is Jewish and has lived in Israel.

Lightman was asked to cover the Al-Haq press conference as part of her coverage of a United Nations conference at the beginning of May – the UN General Assembly Special Session on Children. Young delegates from around the world examined issues such as child soldiers and child abuse, and discussed proposed solutions to these problems.



Naomi Lightman, 17, is a Grade 11 student at Northern Secondary School in Toronto.

She reluctantly agreed to cover the press conference, which was part of the UN event. She says it was the hardest part of her stay in New York.

Lightman remembers being horrified by the personal accounts of Palestinian children. One girl, who lives in Ramallah, spoke about seeing five children shot during the Muslim holy month of Ramadan.

"She was really young and she was cute. It was horrible," Lightman said.

A boy who lives in the Jebalia refugee camp in the Gaza Strip described being held at check points for hours, being unable to attend school and living in filthy conditions. He spoke of how Israeli soldiers shot at civilians "for fun." But the words that will remain seared in Lightman's memory are the boy's description of the Israeli soldiers as having "animal-like voices."

"It was clear that he was saying these are barbaric, crazy people. For a young kid, he said it really bitterly and angrily," Lightman said.

She found it sickening that a boy this young – she estimates he was 10 or 11 years old – already harbours such feelings of hatred.

"It shows how he is going to grow up hating Israelis and probably hating Jews."

While the boy's words left Lightman heavy-hearted, what happened next filled her with hope. Sitting at the back of the room, she overheard a group of young people speaking Hebrew and learned that they were Israelis. Filled with curiosity, she leaned over and asked why they were at the conference.

"We want to hear what they have to say," said one of the boys. "It is difficult but what else is there to do but try and listen?"

In an article Lightman wrote for On the Record for Children, a newsletter of nongovernmental organizations that work with UNICEF, titled Viewpoint: Listening to Both Sides of the Story, she wrote that this Israeli boy's words filled her with "a renewed sense of purpose and expectation."

"Despite everything going on, [the young Israelis] were there and they were listening," she said in an interview. "And that is what needs to happen... there needs to be discussion and there needs to be listening."

Evening to mark 30 years of women as rabbis

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

An evening is planned to celebrate the 30th anniversary of the ordination of women rabbis, June 10, 8 p.m. at Holy Blossom Temple.

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

A panel will feature Rabbi Sally Priesand, the first woman ordained from Hebrew Union College – Jewish Institute of Religion, Cincinnati campus, in 1972; Rabbi Sandy Eisenberg Sasso, the first woman ordained as a Reconstructionist rabbi from the Reconstructionist Rabbinical College in 1974; and Rabbi Amy Eilberg, first woman ordained as a Conservative rabbi from the Jewish Theological Seminary of America in 1985.

The rabbis, who will be speaking together publicly for the first time, will explore how women in the highest leadership positions have profoundly influenced our synagogues and communal organizations.

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, rabbinic director of Kolel: The Adul Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning, one of the evening's sponsors, said the rabbis will examine how the role of women has changed and developed, and whether having women in the rabbinate has changed Jewish life.

"These women have a historic perspective that few of us have, because they were ordained before the others," Rabbi Goldstein said.

The evening is also sponsored by Na'amat; National Council of Jewish Women; UJA Federation Women's Campaign and Advocacy; Jewish Women International of Canada; Canadian Women for Reform Judaism; Women's League for Conservative Judaism/Canadian Seaway Branch; and the Jewish Reconstructionist Federation.

For ticket information call Kolel at 416-485-7007 or e-mail learn@kolel.org.

Interdenominational panel a celebration of diversity: rabbi

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

A recent panel that featured rabbis of three denominations exploring Torah texts on revelation was a celebration of diversity, said Rabbi Howard Morrison, spiritual leader of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Congregation.

"Part of the spirit of the Torah is that Jews are one people; they should come together to share and learn," he said.

The panel, sponsored by Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning, also featured Rabbi Jay Kelman, spiritual leader of Beth Jacob Synagogue and Rabbi Michael Dolgin, spiritual leader of Temple Sinai.

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, rabbinic director of Kolel called the rabbis trailblazers because it is one of few times that rabbis from these three ordaining denominations have sat together on a panel.

"Jews have always had diversity religiously and politically, and our challenge is to bridge the gaps and have open, non-judgmental sharing with each other," Rabbi Morrison said.

Rabbi Kelman said the panel gave him a good opportunity to teach Torah to a varied and serious group of students.

"It was wonderful to present and discuss traditional views on divine revelation to people who might otherwise might not be exposed to such a position," he said.

From the questions he was asked, Rabbi Kelman said, it was evident that people found the panel educational. "I felt a very positive feeling in the room."

Rabbi Dolgin said his only disappointment was that this type of panel is so unusual. "More opportunity for dialogue would strengthen the unity of Toronto Jews."

Any time people get together and study Torah, it is a successful event, he said. "It makes people proud of the choices they have already made. The purpose of the panel was not to win people over, but to increase each Jew's commitment to their own synagogue and their own Jewish practice."

Rabbi Morrison said that he did not speak for his denomination. "I spoke for myself. My denomination is Klal Israel. It was important for me to start out saying that."

He stressed the need for more such panels. "It should not take Israel to be in crisis to bring Jews together. In Pirkei Avot it says that a wise person learns from any person. I learned from the rabbis and from the audience, and I feel enriched."

מכתב למערכת

"אני מניי על עיתונכם מזה שנים רבות. בכתבה שפירסמתם בגיליון הקודם הופיע המשפט"חדיסונגס הקוגניטיבי בין הפוויטיביזם הקולקטיבי לנטביזם הדטרמיניסטית היא מהרעות החולות של הציונות". ורציתי לשאול-מה זה, לעזאזל, ציונות? "

איך אפשר לעזור- אהבת חינם

הרב לנדא ממרכז חב"ד יצא בקריאה לכל הישראלים לתת יד ולעזור לקבוצות שנפגעות מאוד מן מצב בארץ. כדרכו תמיד-יזדע הרב לזהות מטרות אישיות שיכולות לדבר לכל אחד מאיתנו. אנא התקשרו 7770 709 905 וזהו את המטרה לשמה אתם מבקשים לתרום:

1) חיילים ממשפחות מצוקה שאינם מנצלים את ימי חופשתם בבדי לא להיות מעמסה על משפחותיהם. באמצעות קשר ישיר עם מפקדיהם- להעניק להם שוברי קניה ברשתות מזון.

2) יחידה שאיבדה בג'נין מפקד וחברים - לעזור במימון סופשבוע במלון.

3) עידוד קניית תוצרת הארץ- עזרה בהוצאת דף פרסום צבעוני.

4)עזרה בשליחת ספר תורה ליחידות קרביות כדי שיוכלו החיילים להתפלל בתנאי שדה.

זה בעניין של לעבור מדיבורים למעשים.

וביום הששי

היגה קטע ששלח לי יורם סורוקין מדטרויט:

וביום הששי אמר אלוהים למלאכיו:" היום אני יוצר מדינה ושמה ישראל. יהיה שם מכל טוב- אדמה עשירה ואנשים פקחים ואוצרות טבע, ארץ זבת חלב ודבש". אמרו לו מלאכיו:" אתה לא חושב שאתה מיקי נדיב לאנשים האלה?"

ענה להם אלוהים: "בכלל לא! חכו ותראו איזה שכנים אני חולק להם"....

UJA Walk For Peace

The location does not matter,
Nor does the weather.
What matters is that we are walking together.

With each and every forward stride,
We are a symbol of peace and hope inside.
As we walk and leave each mile behind,
We keep our brothers and sisters in Israel in mind.

We march safely in Canada,
For our brothers and sisters cannot.
We are all one family,
We must share what we've got.

We donate what we can,
Even small amounts are a start.
And with each donation,
Comes a prayer from the heart.

In memory of our fallen loved ones,
Let us sadly shed a tear
Long live Israel,
May we one day march without fear.

"The menorah, the ancient seven-branched candelabrum, is one of the most hallowed emblems of the Jewish faith and the shared symbol of Jews around the world," said Jonathan Kroft, vice-chair of CJC's national community relations committee. "The court ruling ensures that no single organization can claim the menorah as its exclusive property and that the menorah's use most certainly cannot be denied to synagogues, Jewish organizations and Jewish persons."

In his 23-page decision, Mr. Justice Pierre Blais of the Federal Court wrote that he found CJC's evidence showing that the menorah is used by several Jewish organizations and synagogues to be "purely circumstantial."

Rather, "it is the historical and religious evidence that illustrates the menorah as being the official emblem of the Jewish faith and its people since antiquity," Blais wrote.

The court cited CJC's evidence that the menorah is as universal a symbol to Jews as the cross is to Christians.

Part of CJC's argument was that the granting of legal protection to CPM's menorah would prevent Jewish groups from using similar designs on commercial wares. The judge agreed, saying "it would be counterproductive to prohibit Jewish organizations and associations from using and adopting a mark such as the menorah, since it has always been historically associated with the Jewish culture."

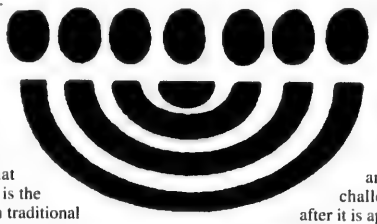
While CJC argued that CPM "is for born-again Christians" who must accept "the deity of Jesus Christ," the judge did not pronounce on the theological differences between Jews and so-called Hebrew Christians. He noted only that CPM is a "messianic Jewish religious organization whose members and adherents believe that Yeshua (Jesus Christ) is the Messiah prophesied in traditional Jewish teachings and scripture."

The U.S.-based CPM's "sole objective," Blais added, "is to spread the Gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ among the Jews in the United States of America and in all parts of the world."

This custody battle over an ancient symbol began in 1997 when CPM applied to the Canadian Intellectual Property Office to register the menorah it had been using for years on its stationery as a trademark.

Two Toronto lawyers who specialize in intellectual property spotted the menorah in a journal that publishes trademark applications for the public to see. The lawyers alerted CJC, which opposed the move at the ministerial level.

But unknown to Congress, CPM, at the same time, had also applied to register its menorah as an Official Mark.



Unlike trademarks, an Official Mark does not have to published beforehand and can only be challenged in court after it is approved.

Both sides had agreed to put aside their battle over the trademark pending the outcome of this latest case.

Congress says this case was another example of the deceptive and underhanded tactics Hebrew Christians use.

"These groups create the misleading perception of Jewish affiliation through their appropriation of Jewish religious symbols (such as the menorah), holidays, traditions and terminology, all to facilitate their proselytizing campaign," stated CJC national president Keith Landy.

CJC lawyers Ben Zarnett and Richard Naiberg also pointed out that Official Mark protection is only granted to "public authorities," over which the government exercises some control and funding. Congress questioned how CPM satisfies the definition of a public authority, which must operate for the benefit of the public and fill a public need.

The judge said CPM is not a public authority, since it is not publicly funded and not subject to any government control or intervention.

Larry Rich, CPM's Canadian director, said he could not comment on the outcome because he had not seen the ruling.

Shuls not accessible to disabled, conference told

By BEN ROSE
Special to CJN

Although many local synagogues have made changes to accommodate people with disabilities, more needs to be done, Lilith Finkler, a York University graduate student, told the recent annual meeting of the Association for Canadian Jewish Studies (ACJS).

Finkler, who is writing her thesis on the subject, showed slides of synagogues such as Beth Sholom, Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto and the congregation at Baycrest Centre, which have made changes to accommodate people with disabilities.

Finkler also noted that there is a wheelchair accessible washing stand at the Village Shul, and that several synagogues have bimahs with moveable ledges.

As well, she said, several Orthodox congregations have mechitzahs on wheels that can move easily if someone accidentally runs into them.

"Jewish people with disabilities are a minority within a minority," Finkler said.

Also at the two-day ACJS conference, held May 26 and May 27 at Beth Tzedec Congregation and the University of Toronto, the Committee for Yiddish, Canadian Jewish Congress and Friends of Yiddish co-sponsored a session in Yiddish that was chaired by Adam Fuerstenberg of Ryerson University. Speakers included Pierre Anctil, Vivian Felsen, Rebecca Margolis and Seymour Levitan.

In another session on the Jewish communities of Montreal and Toronto, sponsored by ACJS, Prof. Ira Robinson of Concordia University, talked about Rabbi Yudel Rosenberg, founder of Eitz Chaim Schools.

In an evening ceremony ending the conference's first day, the association presented an award to Rabbi Gunther Plaut in recognition of his lifetime contribution to Canadian Jewish studies, and a tribute was paid to the memory of Ben Kayfetz, historian of Canadian Jewry and past secretary of the Canadian Jewish Historical Society.

Prof. Morton Weinfeld of McGill University responds to an Association for Canadian Jewish Studies panel that had just discussed his recent book Like Everybody Else – But Different: The Paradoxical Success of Canadian Jews. Pictured (from left) are Prof. Lawrence Kaplan of McGill University, Prof. Frank Bialystok, Weinfeld, and Prof. Susan McDaniel of the University of Alberta. Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl of Beth Tzedec was also on the panel. [Anna Morgan photo]

WOW! – Here comes Bloom

By ERIN SILVER
Special to The CJN

Corinne Bloom

It's a gloomy day, but the weather seems to change when Corinne Bloom arrives and sits at a table on the deck of a midtown Toronto coffee shop.

She's vibrating with energy and buzzing with conversation. At 34, she's a whirlwind of words and excitement.

Bloom has three homes – in Toronto, South Beach, Miami and New York. She owns a communications company called WOW!, which she founded while completing her undergraduate degree. She showed off her abilities as a skater in a 7UP commercial. She moonlights as a DJ for charity, had her own morning radio show, photographs elite male models for modelling agencies, is coming out with a children's book and she has five dogs, three parrots, two cats and a pet skunk.

The only word that can accurately describe this Toronto-born bundle of creativity is: wow!

"It's in my skin to be creative," says Bloom. "Everything I do is driven by my creative urges. I'm involved in so many different projects to satisfy these tendencies."

Whether it be photography or jewellery making (she wears a big, intricate, beaded butterfly necklace that took her hours to create), "there's no right or wrong way to be creative," she says.

Her hectic, globe-trotting life leaves her little time to relax, but Bloom doesn't mind.

"I'm really happy," she says.

Born to an artist-mother and business-oriented father, Bloom and her younger brother Michael, who are best friends, were raised in Thornhill, Ont.

For four years she attended a local high school. Then, she flew off to Switzerland's Neuchatel Junior Collage for Grade 13.

"That year, a lot of changes happened to my personality," says Bloom. "It was the best year of my life. I saw the most beautiful things. It was the first time I was away from home. I felt independent. I learned French, which has stuck with me to this day. I went to museums and became mesmerized by art. The whole experience opened me up and made me grow up."

She returned to attend the University of Western Ontario, set on becoming a veterinarian. She had always been fascinated by animals, but at school, she discovered her entrepreneurial spirit.

"I began making jewellery and sandwiches – anything to make money and to attain financial independence. It was all about going after what I wanted.

"I organized a contest for girls at the university and one of the posters I created was called Women of Western. The girls who won went onto a calendar, sponsored by 7UP," she explains.

She took the pictures for the calendar herself, she says, adding that it was the first and last time she photographed female models.

The success of that contest landed her and WOW! a job organizing the Hawaiian Tropic pageant for a summer. That in turn led to an encounter with John Casablanca, head of Elite Model Management. Bloom was asked to organize Look of the Year, a cross-Canada model search.

"I got the sponsors for the contest, shaped what the contest would look like," says Bloom.

From there, she landed a job at an advertising agency in New York. While skating in Central Park, she was discovered by a casting director who asked her to audition for a 7UP commercial being shot in Miami.

She skated her way onto television and found a new home.

"I loved Miami," says Bloom. "South Beach was everything I wanted to see in a city. It was a bubble of excitement. Casting directors, designers, photographers and so many artistic people live there. It's a nice background for doing anything creative."

She's been commuting between Miami, Toronto, and New York – "a triangle of excitement" – for the last eight years.

She snagged her own radio show after a friend with connections to a Miami radio station heard her ordering a pizza over the phone.

"He said I had a perfect voice for radio," she says.

After doing radio commercials, she got her own morning talk show in 1999 called Kiss Corinne, where she learned to mix music for the program.

"It was like the Howard Stern show but not as outlandish. The format was that there was no format. I just winged it."

Last year, Bloom took herself off the airwaves. She was too busy travelling and pursuing other projects, she says, explaining that she "felt bad disappointing listeners if I couldn't keep a regular schedule."

She has chosen to shoot male models now, she says, because they're low maintenance. She styles their hair, picks out their clothes and outfits them with her jewellery and her pets, which appear in many of her photos. Even her birds have become famous, with one of her parrots being recruited to star in a music video with Gloria Estefan. Now, she's organizing a letter-writing contest for overnight campers across North America and is hoping to be on TV one day.

One of the secrets to her success is having a positive outlook on life, she says. "Once you're able to see the glass as half full in every situation, it makes life so much better."

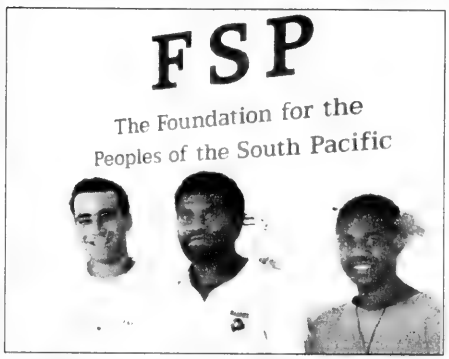
Torontonian volunteers with CUSO in Vanuatu

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Until recently Blake Dinkin missed out on the reality television phenomenon embodied by Survivor, but the 31-year-old Torontonian was busy having his own South Pacific adventures while others here were sitting in front of the tube.

For two years until this past December, Dinkin was based in Vanuatu – a small country formerly known as New Hebrides, playing in its premier soccer league (he was the first white person in eight years on his team), bat-hunting, sleeping on a volcano and – most importantly – sharing his business expertise as a volunteer with CUSO, the largest overseas volunteer organization in Canada.

Before he took on the volunteer position, Dinkin worked in business management in the Toronto office of a Japanese company. "I had a great job. I got to travel a lot, but I sometimes felt like I wasn't making a difference," he said in a recent interview at a Toronto coffee shop.



Blake Dinkin, left, worked with these two artists, and others, on a jewelry project in Vanuatu as a CUSO volunteer.

Hoping for a position that could utilize his business skills, Dinkin found one in the area of business development, working with underprivileged groups to help develop new industry.

Most of his time in Vanuatu was spent working with artists on a jewelry project for a non-governmental organization called the Foundation for the Peoples of the South Pacific.

Having visited Fiji and Papua New Guinea on vacation and business, he found Vanuatu's location and its reputation for friendly people particularly appealing.

Vanuatu is home to 200,000 people (about the size of Greater Toronto's Jewish population), but its citizens speak 140 languages, Dinkin said. The main language is Bishlama, which he described as a variation of pidgin English.

Fortunately for Dinkin, he was able to travel to Vanuatu on business when the CUSO opportunity arose. During that visit, he met with CUSO officials in his spare time. Within two months he had a job offer, and two months later he was on his way.

One of only a handful of Jews in Vanuatu, Dinkin – an alumnus of Associated Hebrew Schools and Forest Hill Collegiate who used to play on a Maccabi soccer team– found himself the object of curiosity on occasion but he said he never experienced anti-Semitism from the Ni-Vanuatu, as the native people are known.

Held a seder for 20 guests

The majority of the local population is Christian, although the Ni-Vanuatu mix their own traditions – including a belief in Black Magic and White Magic – with Christianity, Dinkin said.

A brief hospital stay for kidney stones was memorable not only for the hospital conditions but also for Dinkin's encounter with a singing preacher who brought him a New Testament. Dinkin told him that if he needed anything, it was an Old Testament, explaining that he was Jewish.

Soon after the preacher left, Dinkin heard his wardmates and their relatives "muttering 'Chew, Chew, Chew' [the Bishlama word for Jewish], like I was some kind of novelty. That was kind of a unique experience."

For the High Holy Days, he flew from Port Vila, Vanuatu's capital, to Australia (a three-to-four-hour flight). With the help of technology and Jewish geography, he contacted a rabbi in Melbourne via the Internet to arrange to attend services, and he stayed with a Jewish family – his mother's friend's husband's brother.

Because he had no need for a business suit in laid-back Vanuatu – where he even wore shorts and flip-flops to meet the country's prime minister – he had a suit sent from Toronto before the holidays.

Despite the casual attire, however, the locals he worked with insisted on addressing him by the Bishlama word for "master" as a sign of respect.

Dinkin said he tried to strike a balance between becoming involved in the local culture and having friendships with fellow non-natives. The stipend Dinkin received as a volunteer would have put him in the Ni-Vanuatu middle class.

For Passover last year, he held a Seder for about 20 guests. There would have been more, but some of the invitees had to shore up their corrugated aluminum homes in anticipation of a cyclone the next day. Dinkin experienced two cyclones in Vanuatu, but he lived in a concrete building that did not require special preparations.

His mother flew in from Toronto with provisions, including gefilte fish, horseradish and matzah – a welcome taste of home and a change from local fare like laplap, Vanuatu's national dish of coconut milk, perhaps chicken or beef, and taro wrapped in a large banana leaf and cooked for hours in a pit covered by hot stones.

The previous Passover, a Toronto friend brought Haggadahs and they had a small Seder together.

Now that he's back in Toronto, after an extended trip with stops in Ethiopia, Morocco and Asia, Dinkin plans to continue his involvement with CUSO and help raise awareness of the organization.

His experience has changed some of his perceptions, but not who he is as a person, he said. He finds he has greater empathy for people here whose first language is not English and is also more sensitive to "things like… sensory overload. The pace of life is much faster here. There, people have lots of time and no money. Here, people have money but no time. I'd like to have something in between. I definitely got used to the slower pace [but] I love the Canadian mentality."

He found that he missed Jewish culture – both the food and the sense of community – while he was away, and he likes to think he served as a good ambassador for locals who'd never met a Jew before.

"A lot of times when I stayed in the villages, there was no TV or radio. You talk religion. It comes up all the time. I think that's one of the best ways to overcome racism and ignorance."

Ironically, once he returned to Canada, Dinkin initially found himself "totally stuck on TV. I hate it. I try not to watch it."

Doors Open on three Toronto synagogues

By JENNIFER M. PAQUETTE

It's a once-a-year chance for the city's proudest buildings to put on their best faces, polish their silver, buff their wood and throw their doors wide for neighbours from around the city. Yet for the three synagogues participating in the third annual Doors Open Toronto weekend on May 25 and 26 – Congregation Knesseth Israel, Beach Hebrew Institute and Anshei Minsk – it was more than an opportunity to show off impressive façades. It was a chance to showcase the spirit that sustains Toronto's southernmost Jewish communities.

Offering a taste of "hidden gems throughout the city," the event was designed to stimulate interest in the city's most notable buildings, old and new. Presented by the Toronto Star and Toronto Culture, Doors Open also attempts to draw visitors who would normally be discouraged by "closed" signs or services in progress.

The oldest of the three synagogues, Congregation Knesseth Israel, was built in 1911 by tradesmen working for the Heintzman Piano Factory near Dundas and Keele streets in the city's west end. Knesseth Israel no longer holds regular Shabbat services, but is open every holiday and, according to president Edwin Goldstein, despite having only 90 full members, all 400 seats are easily filled.

Even as far back as the 1930s, he says, Knesseth Israel hasn't had a rabbi – "You don't need a rabbi to lead services!" Goldstein says. That doesn't stop members from celebrating more than a dozen bar mitzvahs and even a couple of weddings each year. A number of young families have recently joined the shul, which now offers a Sunday Hebrew school program.

Visitors to Knesseth Israel, officially dedicated a historical site in September, were entranced by its well-preserved decorations, especially the ceiling, which depicts Hebrew zodiac symbols against a blue sky filled with stars and clouds.

One woman admiring the decorations said, "I bet you don't get many visitors whose parents were married here!" This engaged Goldstein in a quick game of "Jewish geography." He easily remembered hers and other families who once gathered here. But although those days are gone, this synagogue is far from ready to close up shop.

Although its building is older than Knesseth Israel by more than a decade, Beach Hebrew Institute is actually a younger synagogue. Built in 1895, it originally served as the Kenilworth Avenue Baptist Church. Since 1920, it has been a synagogue, first for local merchants and later for Jewish families rediscovering the Beaches in the mid-1970s.

Since its "conversion," it has seen several major renovations, including exterior modifications that resemble "shtiebl" architecture.

Interior of Beach Hebrew Institute with 1986 stained-glass windows.

Its basement is now a social hall, which Doors Open visitors could walk through, perusing displays of notable events from the past 80 years, including Purim carnivals, Chanukah parties and simchahs of member families.

Among several mysteries from the Beach Hebrew Institute's past is the Hebrew plaque on its exterior proclaiming its name as "Beth Jacob" – a name whose origin is unknown and which was never commonly used. According to longtime president Arie Nerman, the synagogue, which was made a historical site in 1982 by then-mayor Art Eggleton, now has 150 member households.

Like Knesseth Israel, the Beach Hebrew Institute offers a Sunday school, Torah study, and other programs, but its real strength may be its High Holy Day services, which draw participants from all over the city, enticed by the interactive, member-led prayers – and perhaps also by its longstanding "no-ticket" policy.

Unique among the shuls of Doors Open Toronto, Anshei Minsk chose to open to the public on Shabbat. Rabbi Shmuel Spero says he wanted Doors Open visitors "to get a taste of what it's like here on Shabbos." The "Minsker" is well-known for its welcoming of travellers, relatives of hospital patients, university students and Jews who resist the inevitable tug northward and settle downtown permanently.

Unlike most other buildings participating in Doors Open, Anshei Minsk wasn't looking its best for the weekend event. On March 11, it was broken into and set ablaze, causing $100,000 in damages to the upper balcony and to thousands of holy books. That damage is still visible, from smoke-seared door frames to the wrecked tiers of seating in the women's section on the balcony.

Yet immediately after the fire, the shul resolved to carry on, offering Pesach seders, ongoing classes in Torah and Talmud, daily, Shabbat and holiday services and what its brochure calls "its famously delicious chicken soup."

Throughout the Doors Open weekend, Rabbi Spero estimates that more than 750 visitors were drawn into its ornate sanctuary, including curious neighbours from nearby Chinatown.

On Sunday, volunteers sat by the door, greeting guests and drawing attention to a silver-foil coated can for contributions, which are clearly still needed for the ongoing restoration. Of the three synagogues, the Minsk was unique in having a visible security presence: a guard stood beside the single open door, a poignant statement that despite best intentions, open doors are not always wise in today's climate.

Local Chinese, Jewish art to honour Shanghai shul

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Artists tend to occupy a different plane than the rest of us, but last Wednesday night, Ian Leventhal was positively floating on air.

"This," he said, surveying a roomful of Jewish and Chinese artists and their work hanging side by side, "is a fantasy that became a dream that turned into reality."

That reality began with a dream Leventhal had a year ago, after returning from a trip to Shanghai and its historic Ohel Moishe Synagogue.

After learning that the city had been a sanctuary for Jews fleeing Nazi Europe, Leventhal, known for his whimsical designs at various Toronto shops and restaurants, wanted to show his gratitude and appreciation to Shanghai and the synagogue, now a museum known as the Jewish Refugee Memorial Hall.

Thus was born A Gift of Friendship Tribute Exhibit, a stunning cross-cultural exhibition of artworks in various media on display at the Chinese Cultural Centre of Greater Toronto (5183 Sheppard Ave. W.) until June 12.

Representing 34 of Toronto's leading Jewish and Chinese artists, the works – all donated – speak to the survival and toughness of two peoples who have endured much.

Art is the common bond. As contributing artist Henry Ho put it: "My painting supports the strength and suffering of the Jewish people during the period of the Nazi horror. The friendship with the Chinese nation was shown at that critical time. I'm hoping that this historical partnership will be a sample of compassion and understanding between all nations of the world."

But the best part takes place after the show ends and the pieces are crated. This Oct. 22, they'll be unwrapped at a re-designed and re-dedicated Ohel Moishe Synagogue, where they will go on permanent exhibit as a show of the solidarity and friendship between the Chinese and Jewish peoples.

"Isn't that something?" asked an exuberant Leventhal, who co-chaired last Wednesday's opening with community activist Harriet Morton. Pointing to the dim sum being served while the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band played, he observed, "Jews and Chinese have a lot in common."

They certainly did at last week's opening, where Jewish and Chinese communal leaders rubbed elbows with Ontario Lt.-Gov. and former Canadian ambassador to Israel James Bartleman, Sen. Vivienne Poy, and the consuls of Israel and China. Officials kindled a large papier maché menorah created by Leventhal, and watched a traditional Chinese lion dance.

The evening was also inspired by – and paid tribute to – the war-era saviour of Shanghai's Jewish refugees. While China's consul general in Vienna from 1938 to 1940, Feng Shan Ho issued thousands of life-saving visas to Austrian, German and Polish Jews. He continued his quiet heroics despite orders from his government to stop, and even after an official reprimand. Ho issued an average 500 visas a month.

As many as 20,000 European Jews escaped by boat to the teeming port city of Shanghai, already home to thousands of Jews from Iraq, India and Russians who'd fled the 1917 revolution. Despite hardships, crowded conditions and a new, strange land, the community thrived, with mutual benefit societies, clubs, hospitals, newspapers, and at least one other synagogue, the Sephardic Ohel Rachel, built in 1920.

After the outbreak of war in the Pacific theatre in December 1941, Shanghai's Japanese occupiers herded all the city's Jews into the Hongkou Ghetto, where conditions were miserable. But unlike Jews in European ghettoes, no one was murdered.

Among the artworks to be shipped to Shanghai in October is a striking portrait of Ho by Toronto Jewish artist Donna Gottdenker.

Ho died in 1997 at age 96. Four years later, he was named Righteous Among the Nations by Yad Vashem in Israel.

ORT Toronto is a major supporter of the exhibit. ORT, with its global network of vocational schools, played a vital role in Shanghai in the war era, providing Jewish refugees with trade and occupational training.

Earlier this month, Shalom Greenberg, a Chabad rabbi and leader of today's Shanghai Jewish community, opened the Shanghai Jewish Centre.

Recently, the World Monuments Fund added the Ohel Rachel synagogue to its 2002 Watch List of the 100 Most Endangered Sites.

For details on the exhibit, call 416-292-9293.

Students must be proactive, says Hillel shaliach

Anti-Semitism on Campus: Helping our Students Cope

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN and FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporters

TORONTO — Although anti-Semitism and anti-Israel sentiment on campus have become a serious concern for many Jewish students and campus professionals in the past year, it would be "audacious" to say Jewish students are "swamped" by it, says a leading campus professional.

While the problem is more serious at certain universities such as Concordia in Montreal, it's not everywhere, said Michael Jankelowitz, director of campus Israel affairs at Hillel: The Foundation for Jewish Campus Life in Washington, D.C.

"When we exaggerate, we do ourselves damage," Jankelowitz said, adding that to say we are suffering anti-Semitism would be to belittle what happened during the Holocaust.

Jankelowitz, who is on shlichut as a representative of the Jewish Agency for Israel, was the keynote speaker at a town hall meeting sponsored by The Canadian Jewish News on May 7 at the Barbara Frum Library. The meeting was the fifth in a series of town hall meetings and round table discussions instituted by the paper in 1998.

Zac Kaye, executive director of Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto (JCS), and university students Daniel Held and Adam Cutler also spoke. CJN editor Mordechai Ben-Dat moderated the program.

Unfortunately the current intifadah in Israel is far from over, said Jankelowitz. "I believe we've got to be proactive... There are many positive things that Jewish students can do... What I have tried is to tell the Jewish students to get on with the job, to educate themselves not to be intimidated, to bring in lecturers to speak on behalf of Israel."

But Jewish students are "bombarded by [anti-Israel] propaganda" and didn't live through much of Israel's history, he noted. "For them, 1973 is what the 1956 Sinai Campaign is for me. [Jankelowitz was born in 1952.] Their first memories are of the signing on the White House lawn. Today that dream is shattered. Oslo didn't bring us peace. It brought a piece of paper, where the other side unfortunately didn't fulfil its commitment."

Jankelowitz recalled his parents' concern in 1967, when he was growing up in South Africa, that Israel was going to be annihilated during the Six-Day War. "How many of our students today understand what happened in 1967, and that there was a miracle? This wasn't a war that Israel went about willingly. We've got to see that history doesn't get rewritten. We've got to make sure our students understand what happened."

If students do not know the history of modern Zionism, he said, they will "be beaten on campus when the Palestinian student says 'You are the occupier.'"

In 95 per cent of North American campuses, Jewish students are organized, but if the Jewish community doesn't support Jewish students, they are liable to be intimidated, Jankelowitz said.

Until recently, students on university campuses had been lulled into a false sense of security, said Kaye.

"The message until now had always been peace, reaching out to other groups and building relationships. Now we're playing catch-up."

Last summer, he said, his office prepared for "what we did not know would happen on campuses. We were not sure what the fall would bring – what the Arab, the Muslim, and the growing, very disconcerting Jewish opposition to Israel would be on campuses."

Michael Jankelowitz and Zac Kaye

Sept. 11, however, created a strange lull, said Kaye, and JCS became concerned with preparing themselves for anti-Israel activity. "The most important thing was to be proactive, not reactive."

During the discussion, Eleanor Johnston, incoming president, JSO, at the University of Guelph, makes a point. Prof. Michael Brown, left, and Sarah Zelcer of JCS, listen attentively.

They hired Stuart Lapowich as Israel affairs co-ordinator in order to create a pro-Israel agenda on campuses across the city, and to monitor anti-Israel activity on campuses.

As well, a number of students created Counterpoint, a pro-Israel newspaper funded by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, and held their own pro-Israel demonstrations, he said.

One reason anti-Israel activity has increased on campuses, Kaye said, is because today's students are "what I refer to as children of the intifadah. The images they remember and are familiar with are of the first and second intifadah, of mighty Israel with armed soldiers and of the poor Palestinians.

"These are the images our students see on television every day, and they do not have the wherewithal to understand what is going on. They internalize a message that is not pro-Israel – a message that is not strong and positive," he said.

The anti-Israel message is spreading, he said, and "by and large, we do not have students to confront it."

At York University, where Held is a student, there have been problems with campus newspapers, particularly the Atkinsonian (Atkinson College's newspaper), which has had many blatant anti-Israel articles, Held said.

Also of concern at York are "almost illegal" rallies held in a central area, he added, explaining that the nominally anti-globalization and left-wing events have turned into anti-Israel rallies.

Cutler noted in his address that, in the campus community, anti-globalization activists, such as those at York, are not viewed as extreme.

"We tend to play what we consider a fair game," said Held. "We hold rallies and information sessions according to the rules of the university. That doesn't always happen on the other side."

A third, more recent, problem is that Jewish students' posters have been damaged and defaced with swastikas at York.

'Jewish students who know what's going on... feel intimated walking around with a kippah or Magen David. It's a real concern."

To deal with these issues, said Held, Jewish students need to be educated about Israeli affairs, Jewish values and Jewish pride. Some programs created for that purpose have been lunch-and-learn sessions and special events such as an Israel advocacy retreat, a concert of Jewish music and the annual arts festival held under the auspices of JCS.

The education should address not only the "matzav" itself (the Hebrew word for situation, commonly used in Israel to describe the current state of affairs there), but also the culture and all the beautiful things about Israel, Held said.

"We need to start getting the other side of our story out. We need to feel comfortable in the campus environment."

Cutler's assessment of the environment at the University of Toronto, where he is a student, was more positive. "I'm glad to say that U of T, as far as I've experienced, has experienced very little anti-Semitism." This year, he said, has been pretty quiet.

Josh Shuval (top) and Aaron Kasman

More common in his experience is ignorance. A faculty member who might want to deduct marks for absences on Jewish holidays is one example.

Last fall, Cutler recalled, the U of T newspaper the Varsity ran an article linking Israel with the events of Sept. 11. It did, however, print a response and since then, almost every issue has had pro-Israel letters from Jewish students, he said. "The Varsity has been acting very respectfully."

Both Cutler and Held took part in a World Union of Jewish Students conference in Jerusalem this past winter, along with 25 other students from the Toronto area, who learned about being proactive regarding Israel.

"One problem," said Cutler, "is how to be pro-Israel without being pro-Sharon or pro-Netanyahu or pro-Barak, because not everyone is right-wing or left-wing. Most people don't care at all. We have this slogan put together by Hillel, 'Wherever we stand, we stand with Israel.'"

Another challenge, he said, was how to incorporate people who are against the occupation but pro-Zionist.

Some methods that have been tried at U of T are handing out fliers, and publishing and distributing Counterpoint.

"It's only through events like advocacy retreats and sending kids to Israel that the Jews on campus are being empowered with the help to spread a pro-Israel message on campus. These things don't come for free.

"We need the continued support of the community to send these students to Israel and to bring speakers [here] from Israel."

Josh Shuval, immediate past president of the Jewish Students' Union at University of Western Ontario, said he was quite concerned about how to deal with professors who spread anti-Israel propaganda. "How do we deal with reputable academics?"

Kaye acknowledged that this is not a new problem. "These issues have to be brought to Jewish organizations who will raise the issue with the university.

"This is the most dangerous form of propaganda, and it has to be taken up with high level organizations. If not, the problem will not be solved."

Jessica Waintman, outgoing president of the Waterloo/Laurier Jewish Students' Association, expressed concern that with only 400 Jews across the two campuses, they feel forgotten and alone.

"We have had problems on campus this year, but did not know what to do without resources. I urge you not to forget about us; we need support and encouragement."

A student from McMaster University acknowledged that students may not show outward support for Israel because they are afraid of the reaction of Arab students.

The four speakers all agreed that if the students are willing to stand up, the response, although painful at first, will eventually settle down.

"On a campus such as McMaster there should be many groups that support Israel's cause," Kaye said. "It is a matter of building alliances and making connections.

"Once you take the jump, you may be surprised at who will support you. The only way to defeat them is not to be intimidated by them."

Asked if he is involved in preparing high school students for what they might encounter at university, Kaye said that JCS ran a three-part program for Grade 12 students at CHAT, and that this program may become a prototype for what they could do on a regular basis at CHAT and at other high schools.

"We are very conscious of our responsibility in this area," he said.

It is essential, said Kaye, that Jewish students learn about their history. "I am a big believer in weekend retreats. They give students an opportunity to focus on issues differently than they do on campus."

There is a lot of propanda on our campuses, he said. "Students must learn how to deal with it."

Students face same advocacy issues world-wide

Several hours before local students and professionals discussed anti-Semitism on campus and Israel advocacy at the CJN's town hall meeting, about two dozen Jewish students from various Toronto campuses converged at York University to learn about the same issues with counterparts from around the world via video conference.

With Zac Kaye, executive director of Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto (JCS), and Michael Jankelowitz, director of campus Israel affairs for Hillel: The Foundation for Jewish Campus Life, front and centre, students sat in tiered rows facing video equipment and a large screen that would enable them to see and hear speakers from Israel, and students from Berlin, Buenos Aires, Casablanca, Djerba, Johannesburg, Liverpool, Paris, Warsaw and several American cities. (A small number of the participating cities had audio hook-up only.)

Co-sponsors included Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Hillel, the World Union of Jewish Students, various Israel embassies and regional offices of the Jewish Agency for Israel located around the world.

The main speaker, Israel-based Neil Lazarus of Awesome Seminars, who regularly addresses students on such issues, said the students must convey four major messages: terrorism is wrong; there is no moral equivalency between the actions of the Israeli army and those of suicide bombers targeting civilians; Palestinians must be held accountable; and Israel cannot be held to a higher moral standard than any other country.

"If there were daily suicide attacks in Germany or America, the governments there would respond exactly the same. We in Israel are defending ourselves," he said.

To defend Israel on their own campuses, students were invited to join a community ambassador training course offered online by the Jewish Agency. It began the following week. — FK

Chatham's Jewish community fading

Southwestern Ontario town follows familiar pattern

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

CHATHAM, Ont. — On the banks of the Thames River lies a sprawling, verdant park that was once maintained by the local B'nai Brith lodge. A few blocks away is Chatham's business district, which once bustled with Jewish-owned retail shops, grocery stores and restaurants.

"I can remember when we had about 60 families here," recalls Jack Solomon, 78, a longtime Jewish resident of this southwestern Ontario town.

"We had a good working B'nai Brith lodge and a good working ladies' Hadassah," says Sam Gluckstein, a former lodge president.

Indeed, Jewish organizations and the community as a whole once had considerable clout and prominence in Chatham, a town of 45,000 located near Highway 401 between London and Windsor.

Newspaper articles from more than 50 years ago attest to the contributions local Jews made here. For instance, an article from Jan. 7, 1950, celebrates the Jewish community for hosting a dinner in honour of an Israeli diplomat. Another article dated May 17, 1976 trumpets the annual B'nai Brith dinner – attended by 600 people – for raising thousands of dollars for charity.

Jewish practice and culture also flourished. Parents sent their children to Hebrew school, the town's synagogue was a centre of activity and candles glimmered in windows during Chanukah.

Most of Chatham's Jews had roots in eastern Europe, as their parents or grandparents escaped poverty, prejudice and pogroms for a better life in the New World.

Part of the allure of life in Chatham was its slower pace compared to the big city.

"My father was a salesman from Toronto and he was on the road a lot. He'd stop in Chatham on his trips to Windsor and liked Chatham," says Solomon.

Gluckstein, who was born in Toronto and came here in the late 1930s when he was 13, echoes the preference for tranquillity.

"I went back and forth [from Chatham to Toronto] to work and I liked the simpler, quieter life."

Ironically, over the last three decades, members of Chatham's Jewish community have left the town in droves for Toronto and other large cities.

The 60 families that once thrived here have now been reduced to about 10, mostly headed by couples in mixed marriages.

And the B'nai Brith Park, once a Chatham Jewish landmark, has vanished without a Jewish trace.

"As we dwindled, we couldn't afford to maintain the park… so the city turned it over to the Royal Canadian Legion," recalls Solomon. "They were supposed to put up a [commemorative] stone. But they never did."

As for the exodus of Jews, Solomon says it comes down to dollars and cents.

"They go where the jobs are," he explains. "After my son went to university, he never came back."

Pausing, Solomon laments, "It's kind of sad when you think about it."

***

When I arrived in Chatham in December 2001, some of my co-workers at The Chatham Daily News said they had never met a Jewish person.

When I went to the library and asked for help researching the town's Jewish history, the librarian stared curiously at me, as if there was no such thing.

A few months into my sojourn here, I met a Jewish woman by fluke.

I had interviewed her for an article and as our talk wrapped up, she announced, "You're Jewish." It didn't sound like a question, but more like a declaration, and I was shocked.

"Yes," I said, barely keeping my balance. "How did you know?"

With quintessential Jewish camaraderie, Judith Pascoe cemented a friendship with the new Jew in town.

Dinners, lunches, news tips – she helped at any opportunity.

Unlike most of the Jews here, Pascoe's family didn't arrive during the inter-war years. She came here in the early 1980s, familiar with small-town life from having grown up in Brantford, Ont.

But like most of the Jews who remain in Chatham, Pascoe does not have a Jewish spouse. She has, however, resolved to raise her children with a strong sense of Jewish identity.

"It's who they are," she says, sitting with her daughters Rochelle, 17 and Gabrielle, 12, at the only synagogue here, the Children of Jacob.

"It's the history of the Jewish people that we carry forward with each generation. Our culture."

Pascoe has opted to send her children to Catholic schools, as she wants them to learn French. All the French schools in Chatham are Catholic.

She says the experience has generally been positive for the kids.

"A lot of people ask why is being Jewish different than their religion and those kinds of questions," says Rochelle.

"They just want to know more information about it, but it's never been something that has stopped me from doing anything."

Pascoe has given presentations in the kids' classes at Chanukah-time and says most of the students and teachers have been receptive.

But there have been moments of friction.

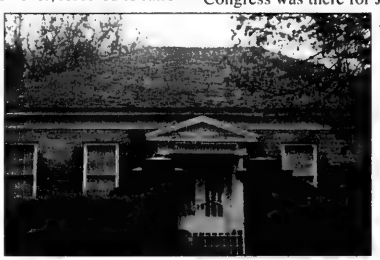
Two years ago, Gabrielle's teacher insisted she memorize some Catholic prayers that she would be graded on. Although just 10 at the time, Gabrielle resisted.

"[The teacher] got pretty upset that I wouldn't do them," says Gabrielle.

"I stood up for what I believed in."

Pascoe approached the principal, who referred her to the director of education. Pascoe even sought the help of the Canadian Jewish Congress.

"Eventually, I resolved it myself," she says. "Mostly, what I got out of this was a really good feeling that the Canadian Jewish Congress was there for Jewish people, not just in Toronto, but in small towns. It was a feeling of support."



Chatham's only synagogue , the Children of Jacob.

***

The accepted folklore among Jews here is that the dark grey bricks of the Children of Jacob synagogue were left over from the construction of the 150-year-old Chatham Jail.

The shul was built originally as a house, but was later purchased by three Jews who converted it into a place of worship.

Although it has the usual trappings of a synagogue – an ark full of Torahs, a library rich with Jewish books, plaques commemorating support for Zionist causes and a yahrzeit board – a closer look reveals that the Children of Jacob is no longer a very active place of worship.

The prayer books are musty, the wooden chairs in an unused Hebrew school classroom make the room smell like a sauna and there's nothing cooking in the kitchen.

Perhaps most telling is the art and crafts on display, including a sukkah made from toilet paper rolls, that Pascoe's kids put together several years ago.

"Seeing the remains of this stuff my kids did years ago, you can see that there is nothing new," Pascoe explains, pointing her finger in dismay at the aging, but still standing, craft.

"I don't think there's been any new people with young children coming into the congregation."

Most of Chatham's Jews discuss the present Jewish state of affairs here with a sense of regret, but all concur that this experience is not unusual.

"I don't think what's happening in Chatham is unique," says Pascoe. "I think it's probably happening in other small cities."

Solomon agrees. "Most small towns are in the same boat," he says.

"My sister is in Sarnia and they dwindled down to a little more than what we are."

The only way to rejuvenate Jewish observance and culture, Jews here say, is through an influx of young people, but excluding myself, it's safe to say no young Jews have arrived in Chatham in many years.

So what are the prospects for Jewish survival here?

If even the smallest effort counts, then the Glucksteins are doing their part.

"We do what we can," says Gluckstein, noting that his wife Frances manages to keep kosher by buying kosher meat from Detroit, an hour's drive away.

"We have services on demand – Rosh Hashanah, Yom Kippur – only special holidays. We get together whenever we can."

And what future is there for the Children of Jacob?

"Hopefully, as long as there are Jewish people in the community, then people will keep coming," says Rochelle.

"As I walk in here now, so many years later, it sparks memories. It brings me closer to my religion."

Gabrielle, after listening intently as her sister spoke, says emphatically: "The synagogue won't stop. As long as there are Jewish people in this community, it will last."

Vancouver's Israel emergency fund-raising drive exceeds goal

By LAUREN KRAMER
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — The Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver's emergency fund-raising drive for Israel has exceeded its target by more than 33 per cent – and contributions are still coming in.

The Israel Now campaign, launched in early April, hoped to raise $1.5 million over a two-month period.

But since the phones started ringing in the Lower Mainland, they haven't stopped and contributions to the campaign, which ends this month, have already passed the $2-million mark, said Cory Bretz, the JFGV's director of communications.

The campaign – being run in conjunction with UIA Federations Canada and United Jewish Communities, the umbrella group for North American Jewish federations – is part of a $300-million (US) North American campaign. The goal for Canada's Jewish communities is $30 million (Cdn).

"We've been surprised because we had to do very little convincing in the telethons, and we've been gratified by the generosity of people in this community," Bretz said. "People understand that it's critical to support Israel and Israelis at this time. We're telling the community that the needs of Israelis are very significant and there certainly isn't an amount that's too much to send."

Contributions top $2 million

Heading Israel Now are Gordon Diamond and Louis Eisman, both of whom have been "phenomenal leaders in this campaign," said Bretz. "They've stunned us with their energy and they've mobilized the community," Bretz said.

Eisman, who donated $10,000, said "the threat facing Israel is on the same scale of severity as 1948, 1967 and 1973. Only our support will ensure Israel's continued existence."

The money being raised in North America is intended for social service programs in Israel that have been strained by government cutbacks in the wake of the security crisis, as well as special projects, such as a Jewish Agency for Israel fund that benefits the victims of terrorism and their families, contributing to their social, medical and support needs.

It's also going toward security upgrades in community centres, kindergartens and pre-schools, Bretz said, adding special measures are being taken to enclose playgrounds in order to protect them.

"We hear about the bombings, but not about the smaller incidents that go on each day and children are very much at risk."

Winnipeg city hall toasts mayor of Be'er Sheva

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Yaakov Terner, the mayor of Be'er Sheva, was here late last month to renew the 18-year-old sister-city arrangement between his city and Winnipeg and accept a cheque for $30,000 from Winnipeg mayor Glen Murray for the new Winnipeg Community Action Centre, a computer learning centre established by the Asper Foundation in a poor area of Be'er Sheva.

At a kosher supper attended by more than 100 invitees at the Fairmont Hotel on May 24, Terner described with pride the growth of Be'er Sheva from a small village 100 years ago to Israel's major southern hub with a population of about 200,000, almost a quarter of whom are under 18.

He spoke of the city's multi-ethnic character, with citizens from more than 60 different countries, including 60,000 from the former Soviet Union and 8,000 from Ethiopia.

"Last month, we welcomed 100 new immigrants from Argentina," Terner said.

He noted the challenges of integrating new immigrants into such a multi-ethnic mix while maintaining a high standard of living.

"To be a mayor today is very hard," he said. "You have to listen to all the complaints while knowing that you don't have all the answers."

The 67-year-old Terner's life and career span the modern history of Israel. Born to pioneering parents in a village in central Israel, he rose through the ranks of Israel's air force to become its commander-in-chief. He personally flew over 300 missions. In 1985, he became the Israel's chief of police, a position he held throughout the first intifadah. He has been mayor of Be'er Sheva for just over three years.

He noted that his brother was a pilot and two of his sons are fighter pilots.

"We need and want peace," he said. "But if we have to fight again, our sons will do it."

Murray praised the Winnipeg Community Action Centre in Be'er Sheva and urged people in the audience to visit. He announced that he himself is planning an official visit within the next 12-15 months. He was scheduled to be part of a mission from Winnipeg in late April but said he had to withdraw because of city business.

Terner arrived in Canada earlier in the week to receive a cheque for $1.5 million that was raised by the Montreal Jewish community. He was scheduled to stop in Chicago and New York before returning to Israel.

CBC on Jenin, part I

In last week's column, I examined "CBC News: Sunday" in a discussion of the many media outlets that bought into the "massacre myth" of Jenin and I promised a review of how CBC-TV News itself covered the subject.

Israel entered the Jenin refugee camp on April 2 in response to a spate of terrorist attacks that culminated in the horrific attack at a Passover seder in Netanya's Park Hotel.

According to Reports
By PAUL MICHAELS

In the initial days of the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) operation, CBC was very cautious not to use the word "massacre." It mentioned the term only to describe the Palestinians' version of events. Terry Milewski, who handled these early reports quite fairly (from April 11), made it clear that reporters were just beginning to be allowed into Jenin, and that the facts remained to be determined.

And so it went for days: CBC reporters were careful not to assert that there was a massacre, always reporting that it was a claim made by the Palestinians.

What CBC reports did not adequately explain was why Israel felt compelled to enter Jenin to begin with. The CBC also did not present aerial footage of Jenin taken by the IDF, which was available by that time. The footage clearly indicated that while there was certainly major damage to the refugee camp, it was confined to one area where the fighting had been most intense. CBC camera shots and narrative repeatedly showed only this epicentre, leaving the impression that the destruction was far more widespread.

Other CBC correspondents seized on this detail, especially Neil Macdonald, who reported April 18 on UN envoy Terry Larson's reaction to the events in Jenin – "This is horrifying beyond belief," Larson said – without providing any Israeli response, even though Israel made it abundantly clear that they consider Larson to be very pro-Palestinian.

Macdonald himself raised doubts about the IDF's assertion that it struck only at militants and not civilians: "Hundreds of buildings [are] destroyed, corpses and body parts rotting in the streets under rubble," he said. While Macdonald did not use the term "massacre," he concluded his coverage by stating that "already the Palestinians and their supporters are saying it was a war crime." There was no Israeli refutation.

The CBC did not buy into the massacre myth, but it did repeat many of the Palestinian charges, trying to balance them with Israel's denials. In some cases, the Palestinian accounts were so emotional that they overshadowed Israel's reactions.

In a report April 14, Milewski quoted Palestinian claims that Israelis massacred Palestinians in Jenin and used bulldozers to hide bodies in mass graves. One Palestinian woman said the bodies were placed in a sewer. An Israeli spokesperson was quoted immediately afterward as saying: "Absolutely not. We're talking about propaganda on the part of the Palestinians." Milewski himself added that the army said there had been no massacre and no mass grave.

On The National April 17, a Palestinian woman declared: "It's a holocaust practiced and carried out against the Palestinian people by the Israelis who will never, never, forget this massacre." Immediately Israel's side was presented: "Israel denies the charge." Four meagre words! When such an emotionally charged word like "holocaust" is uttered, it should be met by an equally strong refutation or else omitted entirely.

More next week about the later stages of CBC reporting on Jenin.

Winnipeger, 91, honoured for wartime heroism

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — In wartime, you don't ask questions, says Eva Weissman, you just do what you have to do.

During World War II, what Erika Simons and her family in Amsterdam did was provide a home for Weissman, a teenage Jewish refugee from Vienna. For her courage and kindness, Simons has been designated by Yad Vashem as a Righteous Among the Nations.

Since 1963, Yad Vashem in Jerusalem has been honouring non-Jews who risked their lives to save Jews in World War II. More than 19,000 men and women have been recognized to date.

Simons, now 91, is the first resident of Canada to receive the honour. It was a letter from Eva Weissman to Yad Vashem about three years ago that brought the Simons family to the attention of Israeli officials.

Simons received the designation in her seniors apartment on April 23 from Jewish National Fund shaliach Rami Kleinmann on behalf of Haim Navon, Israel's ambassador to Canada.

On May 10, Winnipeg's Jewish community held a luncheon in Simons' honour. Weissman flew in from her home in Cleveland for the event, as did a niece and great-niece of Simons who live in Louisville, Ky.

While Simons commented modestly that she wasn't the only one who did what she and her family did during the war, Weissman said the stereotype that the Dutch were good-hearted is not true.

"I have heard that maybe five per cent were very good and another five per cent very bad," Weissman said. "The rest were in between. It took a lot of courage to be good."

Simons herself spent a few weeks in a Nazi prison after being caught trying to rescue other Jews.

Weissman met the Simons family through relatives in Holland. Weissman and her younger sister had left Vienna on a kindertransport in 1938.

Weismann's sister was taken in by a Dutch family who had moved to safety in Switzerland. Weissman was housed with another Simons family, relatives of Erika and her family, in The Hague. Weissman's parents managed to get to England, where their daughters were supposed to join them, but the war intervened.

After the Nazis occupied Holland, they issued a decree forbidding foreigners from living in coastal areas. Weissman was kept in a camp for a short time, then moved from home to home until she was able to settle with another branch of the Simons family in Utrecht. That was where she met Erika.

"Erika told me that her family would always have a home for me," Weissman recalled.

Weissman's stay in Utrecht was cut short when she was arrested by the Germans. "Miraculously, I was released after a week in jail," she said.

Free in Amsterdam with no place to go, she turned to Simons and her family. She lived with them from August, 1942, to January, 1947, when she was able to rejoin her family.

"Erika worked as a research analyst in an endocrinology lab and used to bring home many interesting people," Weissman said. "I received a good education from associating with them."

But times were tough and dangerous, Weissman said. Finding enough food was a challenge that got harder near the war's end. But, she said, "the spirit of young people is indestructible."

In March, Weissman went to Amsterdam for another Yad Vashem presentation to ten more Dutch saviours, including a posthumous honour for Erika's mother, Johanna.

Weissman said another honour should also go to Erika's sister in Holland. "Erika is the family representative," she said. In addition to her Yad Vashem medal, Kleinmann presented Simons with a JNF plaque for trees planted in her name in Israel.

"Presenting this award to you is the greatest honour I have ever had," he said.

Islamic threat here to stay, says expert

munity is very vulnerable at a higher threat level than non-Jewish institutions in Canada," he said. "That derives from an aggressive militancy [among] Islamic movements in Canada" as well as a reluctance on the part of some Islamic leaders to speak out against it. The level of violence against Jewish institutions is highest in France, "but a microcosm of that appears in Canada," Emerson said.

(Two weeks ago, Ottawa police issued a community advisory, warning they had information that a local synagogue might be targeted. In the last 18 months, synagogues in Saskatoon and Edmonton have been hit with firebombs.)

Emerson rejected suggestions that attacks on Canadian Jewish institutions were merely a by-product of the Mideast conflict or the "spontaneous rage of Islamic militants."

"It's not a spillover," he said. "It's an emergence of a radical street terrorism."

Ontario residents as a whole "should be afraid." Prior to the Al Qaeda attacks on New York and Washington on Sept. 11, it was difficult to mobilize any interest in the threat posed by Islamic militants. Afterwards, the response tended to hysteria but now it is moderating and it is important to develop a response that gives governments the tools to maintain public security.

Emerson called for anti-terror legislation, the freezing of funds of charitable fronts that finance terrorist groups and deportation of suspects.

The United States has frozen assets of suspected groups and the move appears to be having an impact. "The shock of having assets seized has certainly prompted many of them to assume a lower profile and not be as incendiary as before."

Some are hurting financially and Hamas for one, has taken to soliciting for funds for weapons on the Internet.

Emerson lauded the efforts of the RCMP and CSIS, the main Canadian law enforcement and intelligence agencies, which have kept tabs on terrorist threats.

The Canadian government has hesitated to act on their recommendations because of policy decisions and the influence of the "refugee lobby" while in the United States, "the policy follows more directly from law enforcement," he said.

As a result, "I think there is a perception that Canada is the weak link in terms of security policy and almost a back door for terrorists."

French Jews contemplate future; Canada often mentioned

PARIS — With France confronting its worst spate of anti-Semitic attacks since World War II, increasing numbers of French Jews are thinking of moving to Israel.

The number of olim so far this year increased by 60 per cent over last year, according to Avi Kadosh, an official in the Jewish Agency for Israel's Paris office.

During May alone, agency officials in France fielded some 250-300 calls a day from French Jews interested in learning more about aliyah. During the entire month of May last year, the officials say, they received only about 100 such calls. During the first five months of the year, the officials add, they opened 650 files for potential olim. During all of 2001, they opened 250 such files.

According to Moshe Almoznino, the agency's director in France, the prospective immigrants do not fit any one profile: they range from single students to families with children.

The interest in emigration comes amid heightened anti-Semitic attacks and follows the strong showing by far-right leader Jean-Marie Le Pen in April's first round of presidential voting.

Many French Jews have become worried about their security, as attacks have included personal assaults and attempts to set synagogues on fire or damage graves.

Following repeated complaints from the community, French authorities apparently are taking heed: a recent visit to the Marais, a Jewish neighbourhood in Paris, revealed a heightened police presence at Jewish sites.

Just the same, many are concerned that the government is still not doing enough to prevent attacks and punish perpetrators.

"The police are completely inept," says one American Jew who has lived in France for eight years. "They do nothing to stop the violence."

Some of those meeting Jewish Agency officials will go to Israel and join family who made aliyah years ago. Others will go because they do not want their children to grow up feeling afraid and ashamed of being Jewish.

As one Jewish bookseller says of Israel, "There, at least, in spite of the violence, one is always at home, because one is always around Jews." Some people, however, think too much is being made of the topic.

"I don't plan to leave, and I don't know anyone who is," says Albert Wajnfeld, manager of Chez Goldenberg, a famous deli in the Marais.

"France is a terre d'asile," he says, using the French word for haven.

The French "welcomed the Poles after the pogroms and the North Africans in the 1960s," Wajnfeld says. "Le Pen is racist and xenophobic but not a real threat, and he doesn't speak for France."

While Wajnfeld isn't about to pack his bags anytime soon, he does believe many French government officials are anti-Semitic. If only Israel had oil, he adds, the French might not be so pro-Arab. But if the government is so much against the Jews, why stay?

"Because we're used to it," Wajnfeld replies.

Others say many French Jews talk about aliyah but don't plan to follow through.

"The attacks and the political situation do seriously call into question whether to stay, but I have no immediate plans to leave," says one shopkeeper, a woman in her 30s who preferred not to give her name.

Canada is mentioned frequently as an alternative to Israel – because, according to one person who prefers to remain anonymous, "There we can find some peace and quiet. In Israel there is no peace."

Israel's own eye in the sky

Improved long-range intelligence ability is particularly important as Iran is reaching advanced stages in the development of its surface-to-surface Shihab missile and may in the future reach nuclear capability. A view from above of activities in two other Arab states –. Libya and Iraq – that are developing unconventional weapons capabilities is also more important now.

Ofek 3 gave Israel important information and although its life span was longer than expected, Israel had to find alternatives during the period it had no spy satellite in space. If Israel wishes to advance another step in the field of satellite intelligence, it must have two or three satellites orbiting in space at the same time.

The successful launch of Ofek 5 illustrates Israel's unique strategic situation.

On the one hand it has to deal with the difficulties of Palestinian suicide terrorism, which aims solely to indiscriminately kill as many Israeli citizens as possible. Last week, the Israel Defence Forces had to go back to Jenin, the site of a bloody battle a few weeks ago in which 23 soldiers were killed. Mendacious claims by the international media that the IDF committed a massacre there continue to be heard. It is evident that Israel faces great difficulty in winning the limited war declared against it by the Palestinians, whose primary weapon is terrorism.

On the other hand Israel has made impressive achievements in space and has strengthened its capabilities and deterrence against grave and existential threats.

Israel, China set to resume defence ties

By AMNON BARZILAI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Setting the stage for renewed defence ties between the two countries, an Israeli military contingent recently visited China and toured army bases in the country.

Strategic-defence connections between the two countries were damaged when Israel cancelled the sale of the Phalcon airborne early warning system to China, largely because of U.S. pressure.

The forging of compensation terms for the Phalcon has enabled the resumption of defence ties between China and Israel. As soon as compensation payments to China are completed, Israel will send the Ilyushin aircraft, on which the Phalcon-type high-tech warning system has been removed, back to the People's Republic.

The Israeli military delegation, including the Israel Defence Forces' chief medical officer and chief scientist for the technology planning division, recently visited China for five days, travelling as guests of China's army. Israeli security sources said the purpose of the visit was to examine possible avenues for co-operation in the future, possibly in the sphere of arms development. The Israeli contingent's visit was preceded a few weeks ago by a trip to Israel by a group of Chinese army officers.

These visits were the first of their kind since Israel, under pressure from the Americans, canceled the Phalcon warning system sale, which the U.S. believed could tip the strategic balance between China and Taiwan. Israeli security sources stressed the visits reflected a desire on both sides to put the Phalcon controversy to rest, and to develop defence ties in the future.

Israeli arms sales to China began in the 1980s, under a heavy cloak of secrecy. Foreign reports said the sales topped $4 billion (US) over those years. The reports said Israel tank cannon, night-vision equipment and various aeronautical subsystems were sold to the Chinese. One foreign report, denied by Israel, was that the Chinese bought a prototype of the Lavi fighter plane, a project that was also scotched by the Americans, who argued it would be cheaper for Israel to purchase advanced warplanes from the U.S.

With diplomatic relations established in 1992, China showed interest in Israeli military technology, but it preferred to acquire know-how, rather than weapons systems.

Suspected mad cow disease found in Golan

By AMIRAM COHEN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspape Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Initial tests on a 10-year-old cow from the Golan Heights that died of suspect symptoms have raised suspicions the animal may have been infected with Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy (BSE), commonly know as mad cow disease.

Agriculture Ministry officials declined to name the Golan community the cow came from.

The brain biopsy taken from the cow was sent last week to the World Organization for Animal Health (OIE) in Switzerland and final test results will be in by the end of this week, Dr. Oded Nir, the director of the Agriculture Ministry's veterinary services department, said Saturday.

If the case is confirmed, it would be the first ever incidence of the disease in Israel. Under instruction from the OIE, another three cows from the same herd, which originated from the Beit Shean valley, were placed in quarantine.

If the cow is indeed found to be suffering from BSE, Nir said, the ministry would operate an emergency plan, whereby all cattle over the age of 30 months would undergo thorough examination after slaughter, all internal organs – which are defined as being at high risk – would be destroyed, and the sale of cattle for slaughter to the Palestinian Authority would be prohibited.

However, Nir said, even if the cow was infected, the veterinary services do not intend to cull the entire herd.

An injunction issued Saturday by the veterinary services suspended the slaughter of cattle over the age of 30 months until the test's final results are in.

BSE is a nervous system disorder caused by a protein known as prion, which kills off brain cells, causing the brain to assume a sponge-like appearance. Affected cows show signs such as belligerence, confusion and poor co-ordination.

A human form of Spongiform Encephalopathy, known as Creutzfeldt-Jacob Disease (CJD), was diagnosed in 1996, since which time some 80 people have died of the disease in Britain.

The disease is transmitted by eating infected beef, in particular internal organs. No cure has yet been found for CJD, which usually causes death within a few months.

A veterinary services spokesman stressed Saturday that the disease is transmitted only through consumption of beef and internal organs and not by drinking milk or through contact with cattle.

European Jews rally for Israel

By TOBY AXELROD
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BRUSSELS — They came from Austria, Greece, Italy, England, France, Germany Switzerland and the Czech Republic.

And, of course, from Belgium.

Usually concerned with local problems, European Jews joined forces to express their solidarity for Israel and concern about increasing anti-Semitism in a rally last week that drew nearly 10,000 people to Brussels, the seat of the European Union (EU).

"The Jews of Europe are waking up," said Harry Kney-Tal, Israel's ambassador to the EU and North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO). "Up until recently, each European Jewish community was involved with their own particular issues. But now they are getting more co-ordinated."

The rally – the first continent-wide Jewish demonstration since the Palestinian intifadah began 21 months ago – was "the first manifestation of this awakened consciousness and the need to move from being passive to becoming proactive," Kney-Tal said.

The demonstration was initiated by the European Jewish Congress and co-ordinated by several Belgian organizations. It was timed to coincide with an EU parliamentary session, though neither the Mideast nor anti-Semitism were on the Parliament's agenda.

With flags whipping in the wind, marchers made their way from Brussels' main synagogue to a square facing the European Parliament buildings. They spoke in French, English, Flemish, Italian, German, Greek and Czech.

When it came to singing, however, everyone turned to Hebrew.

"We are not here to protest against a Palestinian state or against the Palestinian people," said Michel Friedman, a vice president of the European Jewish Congress and of the Central Council of German Jews. "We are here to protest in solidarity with Israel, and to say that if the Palestinians want to have a country they have to deny terrorism."

Some non-Jews also took part in the event.

"As a German – or, as I would like to say, a European of German origin – I know my responsibility and duty," said European Parliament member Elmar Brok, who is not Jewish.

"The security of the State of Israel and the safety of its people is a condition for anything else," said Brok, who has been involved in a campaign to stop European funding for Palestinian schoolbooks that spread hatred of Israel.

Ryk van Damm, a Dutch member of the European Parliament, said he came "to express my disgust at the rise of anti-Semitism in Europe."

More than any other country in Europe, France has seen a wave of attacks against Jews and destruction of Jewish property since the Mideast crisis escalated.

"No Jew has attacked a mosque, no Jew has attacked an Islamic school, no Jew has attacked an imam," said Roger Cukierman, president of CRIF, the umbrella group for secular French Jewish organizations.

Other speakers included former Belgian cabinet minister Willy de Clerk; Cobi Benatof, president of the European Congress of Jewish Communities; Serge Cwajgenbaum, secretary of the European Jewish Congress; and members of the EU Parliament from France, Germany, Holland and Italy.

Organizers said Jewish attendance from some countries was far less than hoped. Some 3,000 demonstrators came from France, which has a Jewish population of 700,000.

Germany, which has some 100,000 Jews, sent four buses, and Austria sent about 60 participants from its community of 7,000.

Organizers estimated that about half of the Jewish demonstrators came from Belgium, which has about 35,000 Jews.

Benjamin Albalas, vice president of the central board of the Jewish community of Greece, which has about 7,000 Jews, said he brought 21 young Greek Jews with him to Brussels. There also was a group from Crete.

Despite the turnout, the mood at the demonstration was enthusiastic, organizers said.

Demonstrators agreed that pro-Palestinian media reports on the Mideast pose a serious danger both to political support for Israel and popular sentiment toward Jews.

"The public does not get the truth anymore," said Frederique Ries, a Belgian member of the European Parliament, who also fought to freeze EU funds to the Palestinian Authority over the textbook issue.

"Everything is in reverse," Ries said. "When Israel makes an incursion, the media doesn't speak about why. They only minimize."

Betty Dan, director of Radio Judaica, a 24-hour Jewish station in Belgium said her station is "trying to fight against misinformation."

She said she gets daily calls from listeners "who have received anti-Semitic flyers with such statements as 'Dirty Jew, we will kill you,' and 'Don't buy from Jews,'" Dan said. "For the first time in 22 years of this radio program, we have received such letters."

Belgian Chief Rabbi Avraham Guigui said that the "Jews of Europe are menaced every day. I myself was attacked in December on the street in Brussels.

"But I believe that one must not generalize" and blame all Arabs in Europe, he said. "We must create relations with the Arabs in Belgium and in Europe."

The rally drew people of all ages, including Moshe Prys, 79, a resident of Brussels who survived the Holocaust in Switzerland, and Sam Topor, a 77-year-old Auschwitz survivor, who wore a concentration camp cap bearing his prisoner number.

"Auschwitz must not happen again," Topor said.

Among the young attendees were Julian Voloj, 28, of Muenster, Germany, who heads the European Union of Jewish Students, and medical student Marie Laure Ben Amram, 24, of Geneva.

"In the last few months, our synagogue and community center were vandalized," Ben Amram said. "There have been verbal attacks on men with kippot on the street. We are feeling that something is going wrong, so I wanted to be here and demonstrate."

Inconsistencies mark U.S. policy to Israel

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

As Israeli forces continue to storm into Palestinian autonomous areas in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip in response to renewed suicide bombings and random shootings, the inconsistencies in the United States' Mideast policy grow all the more glaring.

The State Department, led by Colin Powell, wants Israel to rein in its raids, renew bilateral political talks with the Palestinian Authority and deal with Yasser Arafat.

The Pentagon, under the leadership of Donald Rumsfeld, holds that Israel has every right to use military means to defend itself, maintains that negotiations can only be resumed when terrorism ends and believes that Arafat should be replaced by a more pragmatic leader.

Caught in the middle of these rifts roiling the upper echelons of the U.S. government is President George W. Bush, who often leaves an impression of vacillation and indecision when he speaks about the Arab-Israeli dispute.

On some days, he chides Israel for its armed incursions, urges Israel to return to the bargaining table and lets it be known that Israel has no alternative but to deal with Arafat. On other occasions, he turns a blind eye to Israel's retaliatory strikes and evinces understanding of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's reluctance to negotiate under fire and with Arafat.

Since these basic issues have yet to be resolved by the State Department and the Pentagon, there is a good probability that confusion will characterize Bush's Mideast pronouncements in the months ahead.

In the U.S. Congress, however, no such uncertainty exists. In both the House of Representatives and the Senate, unabashed pro-Israel sentiment is running at historically high levels, judging by two recent non-binding resolutions. As a result, the executive and legislative branches find themselves at odds.

Last month, the Senate, by a 94-2 margin, expressed strong support for Operation Defensive Shield, Israel's massive sweep into the West Bank, and called upon Arafat to stamp out terrorism.

Meanwhile, by a margin of 352-21, the House of Representatives backed Israel's offensive and voiced reservations concerning Arafat's qualification as a "viable partner for peace."

Prime Minister Sharon and President Bush [RNS/Reuters]

On the eve of the vote, in a statement that might have been crafted by Israel's far right, Dick Armey, the House Republican leader, said, "I'm content to have Israel grab the entire West Bank."

Harking back to the Sept. 11 destruction of Manhattan's World Trade Center by al-Qaeda terrorists, the Senate and House resolutions made two further points. The first was that Israel and the United States stand shoulder to shoulder in "a common struggle against terrorism." The second expressed solidarity with Israel's efforts to dismantle the Palestinian Authority's terrorist infrastructure.

Sharon could not have asked for more.

As these congressional resolutions passed muster and as Israel mounted further raids into Palestinian-controlled areas, Christian fundamentalists, who tend to be hawkish and who were originally courted by Menachem Begin, rallied to Israel's side.

In a open letter to Bush, Jerry Falwell and Gary Bauer wrote, "We ask you to end the pressure on Prime Minister Ariel Sharon so that he has the time necessary to complete the mission he has undertaken – the elimination of terrorist cells and infrastructure from the West Bank territories."

And in a strongly worded op-ed piece in The Los Angeles Times, Ralph Reed, a prominent Republican and evangelical Christian, observed: "Israel ...remains one of the most reliable allies of the United States. The shared democratic values and common strategic interests of Israel and the United States have engendered a deep bond that transcends ...domestic politics ..."

Empathy for Israel, and a corresponding drop in sympathy for the Palestinian cause, are also evident in recent U.S. public opinion polls. For example: Fifty-nine per cent of Americans equate Israel's actions in the West Bank with U.S. military maneuvers in Afghanistan.

Iran: Clear and present danger

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Comment

The depiction of Iran as an innocent state that is manufacturing Shihab surface-to-surface missiles because it is afraid of its neighbours sounds like a joke that perhaps only the Iranians will find funny. A report issued by the U.S. State Department last week states that Iran is the most active country in the sphere of international terrorism.

According to the report, Iranian terrorism is aimed not only against Israel; it is also perpetrated in the Gulf states, in Turkey, in Africa and in Central Asia.

Iran is the only country in the world whose leaders urge the annihilation of Israel, and Iranian commentators are busy with the question of whether one nuclear bomb will be enough to destroy Israel or more will be needed.

Israel needs to treat Iran as a regional power that is determined to acquire weapons of mass destruction and the long-range missiles to deliver them. It is therefore incumbent on Israel to follow closely events and developments in Iran.

Last week, media attention was focused on the Shihab 3 missile, which has a range that covers all of Israel and beyond. The reports said the Shihab 3 was now operational and that the Iranians have 10 of the missiles in their arsenal.

Following several failures in test launches of the Shihab, the Iranians suddenly achieved a breakthrough in its manufacture. The key to this advance lies in North Korea. The North Koreans supplied many components of the missile, and all Iranian experts have to do now is to assemble the 10 reported missiles. North Korea followed the same pattern in the past with Pakistan, which last week test-fired two Ghauri surface-to-surface missiles, and the Ghauri is the identical twin of the Shihab 3 (or the North Korean No-dong missile).

To examine fully the current danger posed by the Iranian missiles, it is necessary, above all, to have information about the warheads the Shihab 3 can carry. From this point of view, it would appear that Tehran still has a long way to go before the missile constitutes an existential threat to Israel or becomes a genuine deterrent weapon. It will undoubtedly take quite a few years before the Iranian missile will have nuclear warheads. It is also doubtful that the Iranians are close to manufacturing a chemical warhead with an advanced fuse for their missiles.

At the same time, it is clear that the thrust of Iran's manufacture of the long-range missiles and weapons of mass destruction is to pose a potential threat to Israel and other countries in the region, as long as the present regime in Iran remains in power.

However, today the more immediate and concrete Iranian threat to Israel lies elsewhere: in Lebanon. Even as Iran is developing the Shihab missiles and their warheads, it has carried out a threatening strategic move against Israel by supplying long-range Fajer rockets to Hezbollah. The deepening partnership between Iran and Bashar Assad's Syria should be considered as one of the more important recent developments in the region. In the meantime, he is allowing Iranian religious propagandists to operate in his country's mosques.

From Israel's point of view, the result is that rocket and missile power that is becoming a dangerous threat is being concentrated across its northern border. If the threat is realized, about one million residents in Israel's north will find themselves in bomb shelters.

Hezbollah is provoking Israel and is coming to the conclusion that Israel's silence attests to its weakness. Clearly, if Israel were to release its full might, a serious confrontation could ensue in the region, which would encompass Lebanon, Syria and Israel, while Tehran would sit back comfortably and enjoy the sight of the destruction and bloodshed it fomented.

Islamic threat in former Soviet Union

By LEV GORODETSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW — Jews in the former Soviet Union are increasingly worried that they might become targets in the war with Islamic fundamentalists – and a growing body of evidence supports their fear.

A leaflet that was distributed recently in Chechnya stoked Jewish concern with the comment: "The Chechen people are continuing their great jihad by clearing the fatherland from Russian occupiers, servants of the world's Jews."

Additional alarms were sounded after two men were detained last month in the former Soviet republic of Kazakhstan for distributing leaflets of the banned Hezb-et-Tahrir organization.

The leaflets called on Muslims to "fight against Israel for Palestine" and to commit violent actions against Jews.

In yet another incident, members of a militant Islamic sect based in Turkey were arrested recently in the central Russian city of Yekaterinburg for distributing thousands of copies of booklets propagating Islamic Revolution and calling for violence against Jews.

Islamic anti-Semitism, virtually nonexistent in the former Soviet Union only a few years ago, is on the rise, triggered by the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and an anti-American animus.

A recent wave of anti-Israel demonstrations in Kiev, Moscow and elsewhere was led by organized groups of Arab students – leading some observers to the conclusion that the wave of anti-Semitism is an imported phenomenon.

"We never heard" of anti-Semitism in Azerbaijan, says Natan Mishne, an Israeli businessman born in Baku, capital of the former Soviet republic.

"Local people have always been friendly to Jews," he says, adding that he thinks the anti-Semitism is primarily the result of "Iranian influence."

Mishne, who conducts business in Azerbaijan and has contacts among local officials, says the Azeri government has managed to contain the Islamic threat.

But other sources say that radical Islamic groups are expanding in predominantly Muslim Azerbaijan.

Saudi-funded Islamic groups with links to Osama bin Laden began to expand in the former Soviet Union right after the collapse of the USSR.

These groups, which rely heavily on anti-Semitism and xenophobia, have been accused of a series of terrorist attacks in the former Soviet Union, including the bombing of apartment buildings in Moscow and the May 9 bombing at a World War II Victory Day parade in the largely Muslim region of Dagestan that killed 42 people.

"I understand now what the Israelis are feeling at such moments," says Irina, a middle-aged woman who sells newspapers near a Moscow subway station.

Following the May 9 bombing, some Jewish leaders began calling for action.

"There should be no mercy for the organizers of these murders," Rabbi Berel Lazar, one of Russia's chief rabbis, told reporters after the attack.

Book helps parents deal with losing a child

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – How does a mother prepare her child to die? And how does she pick up the pieces of her own life afterward?

That was the horror Robyn Posen Young and her husband Michael faced when their four-year-old daughter Samantha was diagnosed with a highly malignant brain stem tumour.

Robyn translated her anguish into a book for children, called Samantha's Unicorn, published by the Temmy Latner Centre for Palliative Care at Mount Sinai Hospital.

The ordeal started in early 1996 when the couple's only child, blond, curly-haired Samantha, fell at school. When Samantha developed a head tilt, a bruise under her eye, unevenly dilated pupils, and kept stumbling, the family took her to the Hospital for Sick Children.

"They sent us home after a five-hour wait, dismissing us as paranoid parents," Robyn said in an interview.

But Robyn's father, who is a doctor, insisted that they take Samantha to an eye specialist. The specialist sent Samantha for a CT scan, which showed the tumour.

"I didn't even know a child could get a brain tumour," Robyn said.

An operation, a shunt, and a course of radiation failed to help Samantha, and the tumour quadrupled in size within a matter of weeks.

When more surgery was proposed, Samantha ripped off her hospital bracelet and announced "that's it. Get me out of here," Robyn said.

And that's what her parents did. Samantha lived for six more months, during which time the family, determined to make her life as normal as possible even after she became paralyzed, took her to malls, and, with sponsorship from the Children's Wish Foundation, to Disneyland.

"We had good memories at the end, rather than needles, hospitals and medication," Robyn said.

Samantha Young

Samantha died at home in her mother's arms on December 5, 1996.

"I held her hand until the end," Robyn said simply. "I was her everything, and she was my everything."

Robyn believes that Samantha knew she was dying, although the family never directly told her that. She asked whether her parents would come and visit her in heaven, whether her dog Sticker would be in the same heaven or a different one, and whether she could take her Sailor Moon doll with her.

Samantha also had a recurrent dream, Robyn said, of a unicorn taking her to "the other side," where she saw lots of other children.

This dream gave Robyn the theme of her book. In Samantha's Unicorn, a little girl is told that she has to go to the hospital so doctors could try to take out a bump in her head. Needless to say, Samantha was "scared because she was going to have a needle," and because she would have to have stitches. Her mother explained what would happen, and that she, her father and her favourite doll would be with her.

Before the operation, Samantha was given a needle to make her go to sleep. While she was sleeping, she dreamt that a unicorn named Uni carried her on his back "for a ride above the rainbow."

What Samantha saw there was "breathtaking." There were trees, flowers, grass, a rainbow, and lots of children. "All of the children were healthy. They could all walk, talk, eat, drink and play."

Uni told Samantha that one day, she would be able to come to this beautiful place, where she would be healthy again, forever.

When she woke up, Samantha, her mother and her best friend Zack talked about her dream. Her mother always answered her questions as best as she could and gave her lots of hugs.

She and Zack made a pact that "if one day they couldn't see each other, they would look up to the clouds and talk to them. The clouds would send their messages. They would always be able to communicate."

Thinking about Uni made Samantha feel better, but she decided that she would do her best to enjoy her life on earth.

Most important, Samantha "wanted to get lots of hugs and fill her heart with love."

Merridy Kotler's illustrations, simple line drawings in a myriad of cheerful colours, are just right. They tell the story, while not distracting from the message.

Samantha's Unicorn is intended to be the first in a series of books by Robyn on helping children deal with death. The next one, called Jamie's Rainbow, will be about a little girl who loses her sister, and finds different ways to remember her.

The book is intended as a resource for parents with a dying child. When the Youngs were going through the experience, there were no books to help them, and they felt very much alone.

They did get support from the Temmy Latner Centre and its director Larry Librach. Librach and the centre also encouraged Robyn to write the book, and proceeds from it will go to the centre's Samantha Jaye Posen Young Fund.

The Youngs now have two other children, Jamie, age 4, and two-year old Ben.

The experience of Samantha's death changed the family, making them more spiritually aware, Robyn said.

"Death is not the end – we don't have to say a final goodbye. I will see her [again], and she will be OK."

Local teen leads fundraiser to find a cure for IBD

TORONTO – Colin Yeates knows how urgent it is to find a cure for inflammatory bowel disease (IBD). He has had Crohn's disease for almost one year and knows what kind of toll the disease can take.

"IBD is very unpredictable. It's an invisible disease and you never know when you might have an attack. When it does, you have pain and discomfort, you can be on lots of medications, and sometimes even have to be hospitalized. You miss school and social outings — it affects your whole life," says Yeates, honorary chair for the Toronto Heel 'n' Wheel-a-Thon, sponsored by The Crohn's and Colitis Foundation of Canada (CCFC).

The Heel 'n' Wheel-a-Thon, the foundation's largest annual fund-raising event, is taking place in more than 80 communities across Canada throughout the month of June.

Participants of all ages are encouraged to walk, run, bike, in-line skate, walk a dog, push a stroller – anything involving their heels or wheels.

In Toronto, it will be held on June 9 at Sunnybrook Park. There will be entertainment, food and prizes for the expected 1,000 participants.

"I want more people to be aware of these diseases, especially that they affect adults and kids alike. There are a lot of people out there who suffer from IBD, and I want to encourage everyone to come out and raise pledges. The more people we have at our event, the closer we will be to finding a cure!" Yeates says.

Last year, the Toronto Heel 'n' Wheel-a-Thon raised over $180,000 for medical research. This year's goal is to bring in more than $205,000. This contributing to the national goal of $1.4 million.

CCFC is a not-for-profit medical research foundation whose mission is to find the cure for inflammatory bowel disease.

Medical research is the best hope for finding a cure, and since 1974 the CCFC has invested more than $27 million in major medical research projects, the training of research personnel, the establishment of two world-class intestinal disease research units – at McMaster University and the University of Calgary – and the establishment of the CCFC chair in intestinal disease research at the University of Calgary.

Crohn's disease and ulcerative colitis are two similar yet distinct conditions which are often referred to as inflammatory bowel disease (IBD).

These diseases affect the digestive system and cause the intestinal tissue to become inflamed, form sores and bleed easily.

Symptoms include abdominal pain, cramping, fatigue and diarrhea. There is no known cause or cure for these diseases, and an estimated 100,000 Canadian men, women and children suffer from IBD.

Frequent diagnosis occurs between the ages of 15 and 25. IBD is particularly difficult for children and young adults since it affects a person's self-esteem, body image and lifestyle at a time when "being like everyone else" is so important.

Hurricane Hazel horrors

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

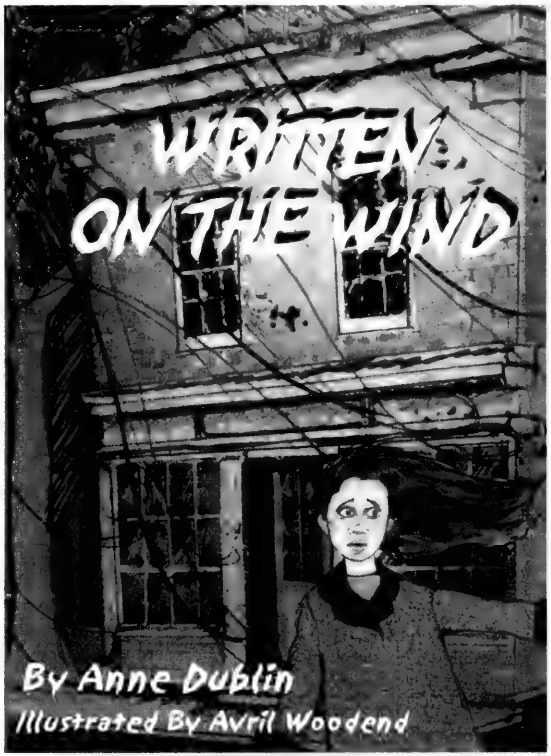
A long time before you were born, in fact a long time before a lot of your parents were born, there was a terrible storm in Toronto, called Hurricane Hazel.

Eighteen centimetres of rain fell on Oct. 24, 1954, and there were winds of 110 kilometres an hour. Trees were torn out by their roots, and bridges and houses were destroyed. Eighty-three people were killed.

It was the worst natural disaster that ever hit the city.

You wouldn't think that you could enjoy a book about such a terrible event, but Anne Dublin has written one that is exciting and scary enough to give you that delicious shudder up your back.

The book is called Written on the Wind, and was published this year by Hodgepog Books. Illustrations are by Avril Woodend.



Sarah lives with her parents and her twin brother Michael, in a house on the corner of Manning Avenue and Palmerston Gardens, near Dupont Street and Bathurst Street. The family lived on the first floor of the house and rented the top two floors to other families.

Sarah's mother expected her to help with the housework when she wasn't doing her homework. Sarah, however, liked to visit a nearby store where she helped out the owner, Evelyn.

Evelyn liked to use a ouija board, which is a hard board with letters and numbers on it. Some people claim that it can tell the future.

Evelyn and Sarah asked it questions such as "Will I be rich?" and "Will my store do well?" But one day, Sarah asked "Will the weather be good?" This surprised her, since, "I didn't even know I'd been thinking about the weather. But there was the question, hanging in the air like a guillotine about to drop."

(I told you that the story was scary!)

The ouija board answered NO. In response to Evelyn demanding when, it replied F-R-I-D-A-Y the 15th. It also said that people would die.

Needless to say, Sarah was very upset. She wanted to tell someone, but didn't know who to tell.

On Friday night after the Shabbat dinner, there was a strong wind, and Sarah's parents told her to stay on the porch, but allowed Michael – to Sarah's fury – to go to his friend's house. "[Her mother] said, "Boys are different. I worry more about you."

Well, both children decided to disobey. Michael went to play on the nearby railway tracks which he knew he wasn't allowed to do, and Sarah went to Evelyn's store. When the hurricane hit, both were stranded.

Some of the most interesting parts of the book are the things you learn about people's lives in 1954. Dublin talks about living in a small part of a house and sharing the only bathroom with two other families; how Holocaust survivors dealt with their memories and a new life; what games the kids played and what songs they sang; the kinds of things a corner store stocked; their superstitions; and even what they listened to on the radio.

(Very few people had televisions then.)

The family shopped at Honest Ed's, a real store that is still at the corner of Bloor Street and Bathurst Street. Even the signs are the same.

An upsetting part of the story (beside the hurricane) is that Michael is insulted and even beaten up by neighbourhood bullies because he is small, and also because he is Jewish.

A major benefit that came from the hurricane was that Ontario created The Metropolitan Toronto Regional Conservation Authority, to establish dams and flood protection facilities. That is why we have a whole series of conservation areas that provide parkland, swimming areas and hiking trails.

Tomatoes

It was true! The stories they had told me were true! This really was an island of diamonds! I scooped up a handful of perfect diamonds and watched the sand trickle through my fingers. Selling all my possessions to get here was worth it. All I had to do was collect as many diamonds as possible, and then buy a boat to take me back home. Excitedly, I began stuffing my pockets with the precious stones.

"Look at the funny man!" I heard a child's voice laughing behind me.

Turning around, I saw a short, tanned child calling to his friends. They all came running, and started laughing and pointing at my bulging pockets. "Why are you collecting rocks?" one of them giggled.

"Rocks? These are diamonds!"

"Call them whatever you want, but they're worthless!"

"What? Even one of these can buy me a boat."

"My father has a boat," said the child. "But he's not taking rocks for it. He bought it for 400 Jumbos."

"Jumbos? What do you mean?"

All the children burst out laughing uncontrollably. "Jumbo... tom... tomatoes, of course!"

"One Jumbo is worth ten Tweenies, or 260 Babies." another child explained, pulling a cherry tomato out of his pocket. "See? This is my allowance for the week."

"How do I get Jumbos?"

"Well, you can get seeds anywhere, but it takes a lot of work to grow them."

"You kids... you're making this all up! Where's the nearest town?" I demanded.

"Follow us," the children chorused, and they started walking up a sandy hill. I followed them, and from the top of the hill, I could see a large city. In the centre was a huge, red building, shaped like a big, ripe... tomato. Maybe these kids weren't joking, after all. They led me right up to the giant structure. "My father works here, right in City Hall," one of them proudly declared.

I thanked them and went inside. About 100 well-dressed men were seated around tables, counting... seeds? I went over to the nearest table.

"Good afternoon, gentlemen," I said to the two men seated there.

"Good afternoon," one of them answered. "I see you are not from these parts. I am Chief Distributor for the island. I assume you are looking for the high quality seeds our island produces."

"Seeds?" The distributor was staring at my bulging pockets with a strange expression on his face.

"Are those — rocks in your pockets?" he asked.

"Actually, they're diamonds..." I tentatively began.

"Those shiny rocks are worthless. I cannot understand why you would collect them." He turned to the official next to him. "I don't think we should waste our seeds on a madman."

"No, no, please don't do that," I begged, knowing that the seeds were my only way home. "I only picked them up because I thought they were valuable. It was all a mistake." I began emptying out my pockets.

"Why are you dirtying our floor?" demanded the distributor. I ran outside, and shook the diamonds — or were they just rocks? — out of my pockets and onto the sand. When I went back inside, the distributor seemed to have made up his mind. "Take these," he said, handing me a cup of seeds.

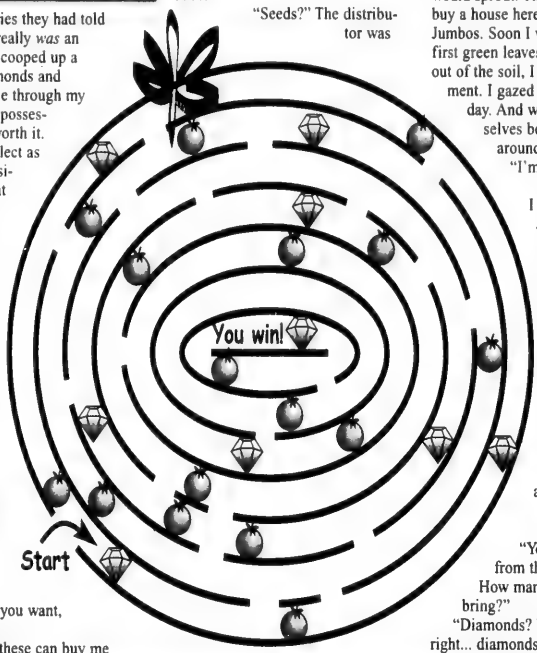
"They're Beginner's Tweenies. If you can bring proof of a decent harvest, we'll trust you with Jumbos."

I found a fertile area to the north of the island that would be ideal for my purposes. I scooped away the rocks — I mean, the diamonds — and carefully planted my seeds. I constructed a crude hut and waited.

The rains came, and my hut leaked terribly, but I knew that soon my seeds would sprout. Then I would be able to buy a house here, while I grew my Jumbos. Soon I would be rich! When the first green leaves pushed their way up out of the soil, I went crazy with excitement. I gazed at them for hours every day. And when the tomatoes themselves began to form, I danced around the plants, singing,

"I'm rich! I'm rich!"

After three long years, I had amassed 20,000 Jumbos. It was time to return home with my wealth. I purchased an enormous boat and loaded it with the fruits of my labours. I took one last look at the island. Ow! There was a rock in my shoe! I removed my shoe and shook out one of those worthless, shiny stones. I threw it overboard, lifted anchor, and sailed for home.



Can you collect all the diamonds while avoiding those tomatoes?

"You're back!" they called from the shore. "Was it true? How many diamonds did you bring?"

"Diamonds? What are those? Oh, right... diamonds. You mean those worthless rocks? I've brought something much better. Look, tomatoes!"

"Tomatoes? You fool! You had a chance to bring back diamonds and you brought back rotten tomatoes?"

They were right. My tomatoes had rotted... Diamonds! I went to get diamonds! Tomatoes were worthless! What had I done? I still had my old coat, the one I was wearing when I landed on the island. Ripping apart the lining I found two tiny diamonds. If only I had brought more. They were priceless.

This story is a mashal, an allegory. In it, diamonds represent the mitzvot and acts of kindness that we always have the opportunity to do. But too often we become sidetracked and elect to pursue tomatoes — things that are unimportant — instead.

AGO hosts Arturo Schwarz's surrealist art collection

By LINDA FRUM
Special to The CJN

In 1998, one of the greatest troves of Dada and Surrealist art was donated to the Israel Museum by Arturo Schwarz, a Milanese poet, scholar, art dealer, and passionate collector. This artistically significant collection will travel to Toronto's Art Gallery of Ontario (AGO) next month.

The Schwarz collection contains more than 750 works of art, including paintings, drawings, collages, sculptures, photographs and prints. Two hundred and fifty of those works will be on display in Toronto, offering visitors a full survey of the Dada and Surrealist movements. Born of the trauma of World War II, the masterpieces of the Schwarz collection playfully dance around morbid, erotic, and existential themes.

To explain the enduring appeal of surrealism to contemporary audiences, Schwarz once told the San Francisco Chronicle that "as long as a man is capable of falling in love with a woman, of staring at the wonder of the universe, Surrealism is alive. Surrealism taught us that we have to take the time to stop and stare at the world's everyday miracles."

The story of Schwarz's life is as fascinating as his collection. Born in Egypt in 1924 to a Jewish family of Italian and German background, Schwarz was deported to Italy in 1949, because of his Zionist and communist activism. But before leaving Egypt at age 25, Schwarz's destiny was already clear.

He had established a correspondence with the Surrealist theorist Andre Breton (the two would become close friends), published his first book of poetry, opened his own bookstore, bought his first pieces of Egyptian surrealist art and cemented his emotional ties to what would later become Israel by working on a kibbutz in World War II.

In 1951, Schwarz founded a small publishing house in Milan. In 1954, he opened an art bookstore, which, by 1960, had evolved into a leading avant-garde art gallery. He also developed friendships with many of the artistic geniuses he represented, notably Marcel Duchamp, Jean Arp, and Man Ray.

Never a wealthy collector but rather an intellectual peer and comrade, Schwarz has said: "In Surrealism I discovered a philosophy of life whose cardinal points – love, freedom, and poetry – coincided with my own. I have thus never seen myself as an 'art collector' but rather as a convinced Surrealist, keen to acquire the works which were inspired by my own convictions."

Nevertheless, after a lifetime of thoughtful acquisitions, Schwarz's collection was considered so significant that the Getty Museum in Los Angeles offered him $20 million (US) for it. Schwarz turned them down. "I'm not interested in money," he once told Wendy and Elliott Eisen, co-chairs of the Canadian Friends of the Israel Museum. "I wanted my art collection to be with my people."

Dreaming with Open Eyes: Dada and Surrealist Art from The Israel Museum's Arturo Schwarz Collection, will be with the people of Toronto starting June 11. It will remain at the AGO until Sept. 1.

Kay Sage's "The Upper Side of the Sky" 1944, one of over 250 pictures on exhibit.

On June 10, the AGO and the Canadian Friends of the Israel Museum will present a dazzling "Surrealist Party" to celebrate the opening of the exhibit. Funds raised will be shared equally between the two institutions.

Usual gala conventions will be turned on their head for this cheeky and glamorous event. Thanks to the efforts of event chair Marc Boyman, food, dress and décor will be twisted around, Salvador Dali-style.

Partygoers are guaranteed a mind-altering experience, and the AGO and the Israel Museum will celebrate a happy and harmonious partnership. For ticket information call Norah Farrell at the AGO, 416-979-6660, ext. 573.

Yiddish singer Stella Walker to sing Roma songs

By ADAM GRACHNIK
CJN Intern

Have you ever heard of Roma music? Mezzo-soprano Stella Walker, a popular Yiddish singer, hadn't either, but now along with Ronald Lee, executive director of the Roma Community and Advocacy Centre of Toronto, is producing the Roma (Gypsy) Musical Experience.

Roma is the proper way to refer to the people once labelled as Gypsies. This term has been widely accepted in Europe and now the Romani are trying to have it catch on in North America to replace Gypsy, a term they view as derogatory.

"[The term Gypsy] conjures up a stereotype image of people travelling around, with bandanas and rings, as pickpockets, you know, not as real people," says Lee, whose group E Zhivind Yag (The Living Fire) is one of the features of the show.

Joining Lee at the show will be some of Toronto's leading Roma performers, who will display a wide variety of music, including jazz, classic and traditional variations on Roma melodic themes.

"There are a lot of great musicians who are performing," says Walker, who is best known for her Klezmer performances and Yiddish songs. "People are fascinated by the music and culture. [Roma are] people who have travelled and have influences from all over the world."

While traditionally a Yiddish singer, Walker will be performing four songs of Zigeunerlieder by Brahms and Dvorák, which is traditional Roma music. However, she will also step into her more familiar role and thrill the crowd with a few of her traditional Yiddish works, which she says is "the most satisfying language to sing in."

The real Roma flavour is provided by E Zhivind Yag, who are performing traditional and modern Romani folk songs. His group demonstrates traditional rich Romani musical heritage that has not been commercialized. As well, they will perform World-Romani music from Roma musical cultures from many countries of the world.

Other groups performing are the Botos Brothers, a traditional Hungarian Romani Jazz group, which Walker calls "incredibly talented and well liked in the community." Rounding out the lineup is The Golden River Gypsy Band, a Roma group from Russia.

Stella Walker

According to Walker, the Golden River Gypsy Band have a sound that is veyr similar to traditional Klezmer music.

Both Lee and Walker claim that it is difficult to express in words the sound and essence of Roma music.

"It verges on Middle Eastern music," says Lee, adding that you can really notice the similarities with the hand-drum.

Walker explaines how there is a melodic similarity and sound similar to traditional Klezmer music. She added that one can hear the violin really well in both sounds

Roma music is diverse because it is representative of a group of people that have travelled the world. After starting out in India in the 11th century the Roma people began travelling to different areas of the globe. Certain groups setted in some areas, while others continued to travel.

For Walker, Roma music gives her an opportunity to explore other cultures without leaving the city.

"By singing I am being taken into different cultures that I wouldn't otherwise access," she says. "I am accessing a whole other world and not having to leave Toronto."

Doors open at 8 p.m. at the Arts and Letters Club at 14 Elm St., Toronto. Tickets are $18. For more information or to make reservations call (416) 534-9958.

Award-winning writer wins another prize

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Simcha Simchovitch, the winner of this year's Yiddish translation award at the Jewish Book Awards on June 4, can look back on more than six decades of literary production.

Known for his books of poetry in Yiddish and English, and for Stepchild On The Vistula, an autobiographical novel that he translated from Yiddish, the 82-year-old retired Hebrew schoolteacher began writing poems as a teenager in his native town of Otwock, Poland.

When in 1939 the Vilna-based YIVO Institute put out a call for young Jewish people to tell their life stories in Yiddish, Simchovitch responded by penning an autobiography.

"It was a nice little book, and I managed to mail it to them maybe a month before the war," Simchovitch said in an interview. "I know I got an acknowledgement that they received it. But after the war they found some of the autobiographies but they didn't find mine. So while I was teaching in Ottawa, I restored from memory my autobiography and I put it in the form of a novel [Stepchild On The Vistula]."

Simchovitch, who still works as a museum curator and librarian at Toronto's Beth Tzedec Congregation, spoke with The CJN in the shul's library. Wearing a dark checkered jacket and brown knitted kippah, he jumped up now and again to pull one of his books from the shelves.

His most recent work – the one for which he is due to win the translation prize – is The Song That Never Died: The Poetry of Mordecai Gebirtig (Mosaic Press, 2001), which the Jerusalem Post called "a treasure," in part because of his lengthy introduction on the life of Gebirtig (1877-1942).

Simcha Simchovitch

Born in 1921, Simchovitch spent the war years as a refugee in Ukraine and Russia, and arrived in Montreal in 1949; he published his first two books of poetry a year later.

His master's thesis at the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York was a study of Solomon Maimon, a well-known figure of the Jewish Enlightenment.

Music program celebrates anniversary at Leah Posluns

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Fifteen years ago, May Ing Ruehle began the Suzuki music program at the Koffler School of Music with four children and a belief that all children have the ability to twinkle.

Today, over 100 students and families participate in a whole-child approach to the study of music on the violin, cello and flute at the Koffler and Bloor Suzuki schools of music.

The Bathurst Jewish Community Centre will be celebrating the schools' 15th anniversary with a festival at the Leah Posluns' Theatre on June 11, at 7 p.m.

Ruehle, co-director of the Koffler-Suzuki program, admits that when she was initially hired to teach music in 1985 she was somewhat skeptical about the Suzuki approach to teaching children.

In the 1930s, Dr. Shinichi Suzuki developed a pedagogical approach to teaching music based on the assumption that the ability to play an instrument didn't depend on talent. Any child could learn.

His method encourages parents to begin teaching their children when they are as young as three years old so that music could be absorbed in the same way they learn their mother tongues.

The music is brilliantly sequenced, Ruehle explained, so that the children can succeed at one skill before they move on to another.

One of the first milestones is achieved when they finish four different Twinkle variations which culminate in a performance of Twinkle Twinkle Little Star.

From there they move on to play simple melodies that build skills needed to play their instruments.

Because children develop musical skills before they can read, the Suzuki approach depends on a great deal of parental participation.

"I know that I'm not just teaching music," Ruehle said. "I'm also building trust with the child and with the families and that takes time."

And while this method requires an enormous amount of time, energy and commitment by everyone involved, parents also often find themselves amazed with all the skills their children learn in the process, such as discipline, commitment, dedication and perseverance.

As with any musical training, some of the children will decide to go on to become professional musicians and others just learn to appreciate music as an important part of their lives.

Ruehle completed a degree in musical performance at the University of Toronto in 1985. Her teachers there included Victor Danchenko and Leo Vigdorchick.

A turning point in her life occurred in 1988 when she travelled to Japan to study with Dr. Suzuki.

"Studying with Suzuki was so different than studying with the Russian teachers I was used to," Ruehle said.

"Suzuki imparted this feeling that you could do anything. There were no limits. It all depended on how much you wanted to work. One of the most important lessons he taught me was each child is different," Ruehle said. Even when playing the most simple stroke on the violin, kids will produce their own tone and sound.

Simchovitch wins book award

Written in Hebrew, it was published in Tel Aviv in 1971 under the title Solomon Maimon: His Personality and Attitude Towards Judaism. It has not been translated into English. "I was attracted to this figure because I saw him as a forerunner of a secular Jew; he was living in the 18th century, before secular Jews came to the fore," Simchovitch said. "He was persecuted by Orthodox Jews because he was a free-thinker – even by Moses Mendelsohn the emancipationist.

"Zangwill and Graetz attacked him because he led a dissolute life; he was getting drunk and so on. I defended him. I explained that instead of accusing him we should accuse the German Jews, for allowing such a genius to starve and go homeless. When he died, he was buried in the city of Glagau and Jewish children threw stones after his coffin. They buried him near the fence like a heretic and they didn't even put a tombstone on his grave."

Simchovitch published a book of poetry, Sorrow and Consolation, in 1989 and received the I.J. Siegal Prize for Yiddish literature in 1991. Three more books of Yiddish poetry followed in the '90s, as well as A Song Will Remain, a collection of poems translated into English.

His novel appeared in 1992. "It tells about my childhood and youth," he said. "It takes place in the first week of World War II. In Yiddish it's called Shtifkind Bay Der Vaysl. Why a stepchild? Because Jewish children were treated like stepchildren in Poland."

As expected, the Holocaust is a central theme in Simchovitch's work. He also writes about Canada, poetry and literature, and about love and old age. Since he is a leading figure among Canada's small but distinguished circle of Yiddish writers and poets, it's no great surprise that he has won the Jewish Book Awards translation prize several times before.

He is still active in Yiddish organizations and still makes contributions to the New York-based Yiddish Forward. Last November, he wrote the article "Exceptional or Rare Judaica Treasures in Toronto," based on his curatorial knowledge and experience at Beth Tzedec.

Although his literary career has had a slow trajectory, he now has several projects on the go, including the translation and editing of a Polish memoir by his aunt about her Holocaust experiences.

Argentina is a land of many geographic contrasts

By GERRY SCHWARTZ
Special to The CJN

BUENOS AIRES — After making some new friends from Buenos Aires while on vacation in Cuba last year, I ventured forth in October 2001 (their springtime) on the long journey to the land of "tango and gauchos".

Well, these two "symbols" do remain but mostly for tourist consumption. As I discovered, the romantic images linger along with Evita, but the reality of modern Argentina's economic and social problems was more in evidence. Nevertheless, I did see a genuine gaucho (minus his horse and bolos) in from the pampas, in the town of Neuquen. I also saw large and noisy demonstration- marches by students, workers and seniors to protest huge cuts in their standards of living and educational opportunities.

The Argentine Republic is a land of many geographic contrasts from the subtropical area of Iguazu Falls in the North bordering Paraguay and Brazil, to the vineyards and high Andes of Mendoza, and the scenic wonders of Patagonia in the south. There are 14 states and also 14 "national territories" with smaller populations.

There is also a "federal district" which is the greater Buenos Aires metropolitan area – over 10 million population – the capital of the state of the same name. It is a vast country, distances are great, and one can only have a taste of its infinite variety.

I chose to divide my time between Buenos Aires, northern Patagonia, the Mendoza region and a ride over Aconcagua National Park (the highest peak in South America) to Santiago, Chile on the other side of the Andes. Buenos Aires, though noisy, overcrowded and showy, has Paris architecture from the art-deco period, wonderful food, and exuberant people.

Also, since it is on the Rio de La Plata, the city offers a restored waterfront district not to mention the oldest Italian district called "La Boca", where the Tango originated.

Food is varied and very European. From here one can ferry across to Colonia, Uruguay for a pleasant day in a historic Spanish colonial town.

Since the fares for travel within the country are very high, I chose to travel thousands of kilometres by overnight buses, which are safe, offer hot meals with wine on board and are very comfortable. It offers a great chance to meet the locals that can still afford to travel, though basic Spanish is a must for conversing.

There are over 200 bus platforms at the huge Retiro station in the capital with lines radiating in every direction. Southern Patagonia with its glaciers and gateway to Antarctica was out of reach, the famous resorts of Northern Patagonia are accessible and affordable: Bariloche and San Martin de los Andes.

One first traverses the Pampas – a dry, scrubby land of steppes to reach the Andean side in the Lake District known as Siete Lagos. Bariloche is a relaxation mecca for both local and international tourism for good reason – it is on a beautiful glacial lake and wildflowers were out in October while the surrounding peaks were still covered with snow. There was also an excellent variety of restaurants with very varied menus.

It felt more like Switzerland with alpine architecture to match its surroundings. Between the aftermath of September 11th's effect on tourism and the local economic crisis, I was one of the very few international tourists around. Within a few hundred kilometres of Bariloche one has pristine lakes and beautiful peaks both on the Argentine and Chilean sides of the border region. By the way, the Israeli flag was flying proudly at the beautiful resort hotel Llao-Llao.

After more sightseeing in Buenos Aires, I set out on yet another long bus journey to the province and city of Mendoza northeast of the capital, the wine district and the high cordillera of the Andes separating the country from Chile. Mendoza is a very clean, low-key city surrounded by a beautiful hinterland of vineyards, rivers, and snow-capped mountain peaks.

It was in this outpost (over 90 per cent of the Jewish population is in Buenos Aires) through a contact in Buenos Aires that I met a dwindling but very vibrant Jewish community devoted to Israel. Again, the Italian immigrant roots of this country are as evident here as are the Spanish roots. The central huge park was laid out by a French architect and is reminiscent of the Bois du Boulogne in Paris.

One ascends the desolate high-mountain route to the Chilean border past ancient Inca structural remains to pass alongside Mt. Aconcagua, the highest peak in South America, over 20,000 feet above sea level. On the other side, one descends the Caracoles (Snails) switchback roads near the ski resort of Portillo to reach Santiago de Chile and the famous Pacific Ocean resort of Vina del Mar.

I flew out of Santiago back to Toronto via Panama City and Houston. I can only hope that the future of Argentina is more stable and optimistic than its current difficult times.

For more on the country, click onto www.sectur.gov.ar – the official Argentine tourism web site – which also has a "Shalom Argentina" section on the history of the Jewish immigration. If your Spanish is good enough, www.Clarin.com has daily news from Buenos Aires and elsewhere.

Nyman Ink. knows the secrets to success

By ERIN SILVER
Special to The CJN

Nyman Ink. is the kind of company people would pay to employ them.

Offering employees a personal trainer, masseuse, mandatory paid volunteer days, the chance to upgrade their skills every season, and barbecue lunches, Judy Nyman, founder and president of Nyman Ink., Creative Communications Solutions, has found the secret to success. She's come up with creative solutions to keep her employees and clients happy and to keep her business growing.

Since starting a newsletter-writing business in her den just over 10 years ago, this award-winning journalist-turned entrepreneur has expanded her line of work. Her company now also specializes in creating logos, and writing and designing content for the Web. As well, she creates annual reports for a variety of non-profit and corporate companies.

Indeed, Nyman Ink. has come a long way from her home office business that originally included a staff of just one – herself.

Her company has expanded to include two graphic designers, three writers/editors and three other office staff.

"I left my job with the Toronto Star in 1989 after my second child was born, to spend time with my family," says Nyman, 51, and a mother of two, Jay, 20, and Becca, 14. She continued to write for the Star on a freelance basis until 1996.

But after having worked as a journalist full-time for over 15 years, first at the Hamilton Spectator from 1976 to 1982 and then at the Toronto Star Nyman became bored.

That's when she began to embark on what would become a whole new career.

"Nyman Ink. grew out of my volunteer activities," she says, sitting in the glass-walled, open-concept boardroom in her spacious green and purple coloured office – Nyman Ink.'s signature colours.

"I began asking Jewish organizations if they needed help with their newsletters and everyone wanted help. My first clients were Reena, Mazon Canada and Jewish Family & Child Service. By the end of the year I was doing volunteer work full time. I was putting out so many newsletters that I hired a secretary, then a graphic artist, then a printer, because people wanted one-stop shopping, which is one reason Nyman Ink. has been so successful."

Then in 1991, Holy Blossom Temple came knocking on her door requesting her services, only this time, the job was a bit different.

"The Temple asked if I'd be interested in becoming the editor of the Holy Blossom Bulletin. I said I would love to, but I'm already inundated with volunteer work. They said, 'this is a paying job.' The synagogue became my first paying client. I still do all of their work," says Nyman.

"From there on my business expanded strictly by word of mouth."

With her business growing, Nyman moved her company into half of her basement. Then she expanded into the rest of the basement, where she and her all-female employees enjoyed the benefits of having a personal trainer once a week. (Her third-floor bedroom is where she and her staff enjoyed monthly massages.)

"Then my family threw me out," laughs Nyman. "Fortunately my dad owned this property [at Queen and Dufferin] and we moved in in January of 1999."

Though her new office has the capacity to house 50 more employees, Nyman wants to keep it small.

"It's not in my plans to have a big company. What I like is that we all work together. We have production meetings every morning so that everybody here knows what everybody else is doing and so that everyone is able to answer your questions," she explains.

"Because of our size we're very client oriented. We go the extra mile to ensure clients are happy. We also do excellent work creatively and we're second to none in quality. Because we're small, we can also implement good ideas quickly and don't have to go through three other departments. I don't want to get so big that we can't do these things."

Her instincts have paid off. Nyman Ink. has racked up over 40 awards for content and design in the last five years.

No doubt, helping her employees feel good about themselves and about their involvement in the company has been a big part of Nyman Ink.'s success.

Though the company now includes men and there is no longer a masseuse or personal trainer coming in at lunch, Nyman offers her employees other, perhaps more valuable, opportunities.

"Every season I offer employees the chance to take professional development courses if it's related to work. I pay for it, and it's good for them and for Nyman Ink. It improves upon the talent they already have and helps them think of fresh ideas."

Her company does a lot of pro bono work, and volunteerism is something she has tried to make a priority in her corporate life and in her family life.

"Volunteering is very important to me and to my husband [Harley Mintz]. It's a big part of my life. It's part of what I do and who I am. It's how I got started and how I grew."

She encourages her employees to volunteer too. They all get one paid day a month to volunteer for an organization of their choice.

The real secret to success, she insists, is knowing how to hire the right people, people who know more than she does.

"I hire people with the skills I don't have. I learn from them. You can't know everything, and the key is to know that."

Sonny Goldstein, CFP

Laskin makes his guitars a work of art

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

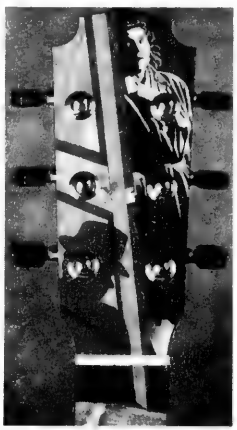
TORONTO — Guitar maker William "Grit" Laskin's clients are prepared to wait years for their instruments. His buyers, both professional and amateur musicians, look for the best.

It takes a long time to create a Laskin guitar. The waiting list extends past 2003 and 2004 to 2005.

Hamilton-born Laskin began to study guitar when he was just nine years old – his teacher was young Teddy Minden (now a judge). He did not read music but trained himself to play by ear and started composing.

At 17, he went to Toronto, where he later met Jean Larrivee. It was Laskin's first encounter with a guitar maker. Intrigued, he persuaded Larrivee to take him on an apprentice.

"It was a typical master-apprentice relationship," he says. Larrivee had learned his craft from a German prisoner of war who had in turn studied with a Spaniard and "the branches ultimately went back to Antonio de Torres, considered the Stradivarius of the guitar," Laskin said.



Thirty-one years after Laskin constructed his first guitar, he is still adapting his craft. Unlike the master violin makers who strive to emulate the traditional creations of Amatis, Cremonas, Stradivarii, guitar makers forge ahead because the guitar is still a developing instrument. This, Laskin feels, makes it more exciting. Building a guitar is a greater challenge because of demanding structural differences, he says.

Laskin builds string, classical and flamenco guitars, using India rosewood, mahogany, Spanish cedar, ebony, Sitka spruce and British Columbia red cedar. Custom features include original inlay art, body bevels for comfort, extra strings, alternate woods. His inlays are one-of-a-kind detailed "paintings" made of stone, shell, legal ivory (walrus) and metal, and are entirely hand engraved.

Laskin's studio, located in a former industrial building, has a room for storing, cutting and sanding the raw lumber; a humidity controlled space (vital for the life of the instrument) where for assembly, building and gluing; and a third room for applying the traditional lacquer (not synthetic), polishing, sanding, re-polishing – a very delicate operation.

"You should always be in fear that you might sand the polish right through to the wood; only enough is needed," Laskin says.

As well as creating guitars, Laskin also plays in clubs across Canada and in the United States. Much of what he presents is his own music.

He is also a founding partner in Borealis Records, a folk label representing some 30 acts of folk music as well as blues, celtic, traditional bluegrass and light klezmer music. He has four of his own albums.

A co-founder of the Association of Stringed Instrument Artisans (ASIA), Laskin is also the author of the first Code of Ethics for the Luthiers (stringed instrument makers) trade.

In 1997, Laskin was the first musical instrument maker to receive Canada's prestigious Saidye Bronfman National Craft Award for Excellence. There is only one recipient for this award each year.

New Flying Bulgar songs a hit with audience

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band was in fine form on May 25 at the Isabel Bader Theatre.

Presenting a one-night-only concert of new compositions, songs, poetry and spoken word, and featuring special guests Jane Bunnett and Alex Poch-Goldin, the band spread its wings and soared, like the doves on the background screen on the nearly bare stage.

Displaying musical agility and inventiveness, the musicians skillfully blended the upbeat klezmer genre with the pulsating rhythms of Cuban music.

Yiddish and Cuban music? A contradiction in terms? Not really, since a lot of Cuban music originated in Spain, the core of whose musical traditions are connected with Jews, Arabs and Roma.

Tossed into the mix was the soulful poetry of Yiddish poet Abraham Sutzkever.

Judging by the constant applause, as well as by the standing ovation they received at the close of their two-hour concert, they succeeded admirably.

The musicians on this rollicking night were David Buchbinder on trumpet and fluegelhorn, Daniel Barnes on drums, Jane Bunnett on soprano sax and flute, Andrew Downing on bass and bass clarinet, Marilyn Lerner on piano and Bob Stevenson on clarinet and bass clarinet.

They played exceedingly well and seemed pleased with their performance.

Alex Poch-Goldin, an actor, playwright and poet, was the narrator.

The narrative theme of the evening, Shekhine: Spirit in the Natural World, was an exploration of the feminine dimension of the Divine.

It should be noted that some of the music premiered at this concert will appear in the band's fifth CD, scheduled to be released next year on the Traditional Crossroads label. The concert was sponsored by the Canada Council for the Arts and the Ashkenaz Foundation.

Hockey all-star's in limbo after last junior year

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

Cory Pecker's remarkable tally of 82 goals in 81 games for the Ontario Hockey League's Erie Otters during the regular season and playoffs was overshadowed by the play of one of his teammates, a former first round draft pick of the Toronto Maple Leafs.

When you play on the same Erie Otters club as Brad Boyes, the OHL's most valuable player in both the regular season and the playoffs, chances are your accomplishments are bound to get overlooked.

Boyes will play next year either in Toronto or, more likely, in St. John's with the Baby Leafs.

But Pecker's future is up in the air after recently concluding his fifth and final season in Canadian major junior hockey as an undrafted overager. He is now hoping to catch on with an NHL club as a free agent.

Based on the numbers he put up this past season, Pecker shouldn't have too much trouble finding a new home.

"I'm going to look and see where the best opportunity is for myself and then I'm going to decide," the league's overage player of the year said in a telephone interview from Erie, Pa. "A few teams have called [my agent] and are interested.

"My agent has a few connections in Europe and I think I'd look at that next after North America. I think if I didn't catch on with [an NHL] team, Europe would be another good situation for me."

A three-time league all-star, Pecker was the OHL's leading scorer in the playoffs with 42 points (25 goals, 17 assists) in 21 games, leading Erie to its first championship. The Otters beat the Barrie Colts four games to one in the final.

Pecker also notched a pair of goals in the club's 5-4 overtime loss to Victoriaville in the Memorial Cup semi-final. He finished the event with four goals and three assists in four games and landing a spot on the tournament's all-star team.

The Montreal native was the OHL player of the month three consecutive times from January to March, and in February he was recognized as the Canadian Hockey League player of the month.

The six-foot, 195-lb Pecker also became the first 50-goal scorer in the Otters' six-year history, totaling 53 goals and 46 assists in 56 regular-season games.

Ottawa's Miguel Delisle led the league with 55 goals, but played in 11 more games than Pecker, who missed five weeks in the early part of the season with a broken arm.

"[Pecker is] a prolific scorer obviously, but he's not just an opportunist," said Sherry Bassin, the Otters owner and general manager. "He's got a very good shot, knows how to read the play, and where to go to get the puck."

Pecker re-entered the 2001 NHL entry draft, after having scored a short-handed hat trick against Brampton in a nationally televised game on the second night of Passover during last year's playoffs. But no NHL team picked him.

"I was a little surprised at going undrafted last year," said Pecker, who did get invited to the St. Louis Blues training camp last fall. "It was a big wakeup call for myself. I remember that day, sitting and waiting and I think after that I kind of realized that I'm really going to have to work hard and make sure I have a great season and hope that this time around I get a little better luck."

Pecker was originally a seventh-round pick of the Calgary Flames in 1999, but after two training camps, the club elected not to offer him a contract. He says he didn't feel he got a fair shot at making the team because the guys who drafted him were fired the next year and new management wanted their own kids.

The 21-year-old went back into last year's draft coming off a campaign in which he potted 41 goals in 61 games split between Sault Ste. Marie and Erie, where he was traded in mid-season.

Pecker, who won a gold medal at the 1997 Maccabiah Games, returned to Erie in September after failing to stick with the Blues. It turned out to be the best decision he could have made.

While his 53 goals and 99 points on the year set new Otter records, what elevated his game the most this past season was the role played defensively.

"He's really accepted responsibility for his defensive play," said Bassin. "He understands defensively now to be alert and work hard. That's become a habit too."

Cory Pecker

"When I see a number of these other players that NHL teams have committed to, there's no question in my mind that this guy's comparatively got such offensive ability that they have to take a long look at him. If someone doesn't take notice as to what he's done and looked at his leadership abilities, they should get their eyes checked."

For years, the grill has been controlled by men, but now, more women are taking on the tongs! For a free copy of Weber's Girls' Guide to Grilling, call the Weber Grill-Line at 1-800-GRILL-OUT (1-800-474-5568). The hotline is open 7 days a week, until Labour Day, from 7 a.m. to 11 p.m. Their experts will gladly answer your grilling questions.

If you want to be a grilling guru, check out Weber's Big Book of Grilling by Jamie Purviance et al (Chronicle Books, 416 pp, photos, $38.95). You'll master smoke cooking, grilling safety and indirect cooking (arranging the fire on either side of the food to roast it instead of broil it). This is not a kosher book, but many recipes can be easily adapted. You'll be tempted by the Slow-Smoked Prime Rib, Oak-Grilled Salmon and Chocolate Cake on the Grill!

Here's a technique that delivers great-tasting chicken and makes a lively conversation starter. This rub is good on virtually everything.

Multiply the recipe, store it in a tightly sealed jar, and massage it into whatever needs a quick pick-me-up before it hits the grill.

Enjoy…

BEER CAN CHICKEN

For the Rub:

1 tsp. dry mustard
1 tsp. granulated onion
1 tsp. paprika
1 tsp. kosher salt
½ tsp. granulated garlic
½ tsp. ground coriander
½ tsp. ground cumin
½ tsp. freshly ground black pepper
1 whole chicken, 4 to 5 lbs.
2 tsp. vegetable oil
1 can (16 oz.) beer

Rub: Preheat grill. In a small bowl, combine ingredients.

Remove and discard neck, giblets and any excess fat from chicken. Rinse chicken, inside and out, under cold water; pat dry with paper towels.

Lightly spray or brush all over with vegetable oil and season, inside and out, with the rub.

Open the beer can; pour off half the beer. Set half-full can on a flat surface and slide chicken over the top so the can fits inside the cavity. Transfer bird to the grill, keeping the can upright. Carefully balance the bird on its two legs and the can. Grill over indirect/medium heat until juices run clear and internal temperature reaches 170 in breast and 180 in thickest part of thigh, 1¼ to 1½ hours.

Wearing barbecue mitts, carefully remove chicken and beer can from grill, being careful not to spill beer – it will be hot! Let chicken rest about 10 minutes before lifting it from the can. Discard beer. Cut chicken into serving pieces. Serve warm. Makes 4 to 6 servings.

Edwin Allen Productions won for Best Event for a private party.

Local heroes win big

By ADAM GRACHNIK
CJN Intern

The votes are in, the awards given out and some of Toronto's party industry mavens have been nationally recognized for their outstanding achievement this year.

The prestigious awards were handed out at the fifth annual Canadian Event Industry Awards (CEIA) night in Calgary last month.

Among the winners are: Bash Productions for Outstanding Logistical Achievement, Up & Coming Events for producing the Best Wedding and Edwin Allen Productions for the Best Event for a Private Party.

None of the 30 winners receive a cash prize, but instead have the honour of being recognized by their industry peers.

"We were ecstatic," says Charlene Goldfarb of Bash Productions. "It was a feeling that just ran through us. We were crying, it was amazing."

Karen Jacobs and Karen Garscadden, from Up & Coming Events, were equally as pleased.

"We are just thrilled. It was an unbelievable experience to be there," said Jacobs, with Garscadden adding that it was really rewarding to be recognized by people who can look at these events critically.

"We're elated," says Ed McMurtry from Edwin Allen Productions. "Just to be nominated is quite spectacular. For a small company like us to compete is quite a coup."

All three simchahs produced were obviously amazing. But each had different details that made them special.

The duo from Bash Productions pulled an award-winning bat mitzvah together by converting the Beth Tzedec Shul into a New York city-style nightclub. According to Goldfarb, the kids were given VIP passes, which gave them access to the stage area furnished with swanky couches and glow sticks. All of the adult table tops lit up and the ceiling played host to an ongoing laser light show. There were four cages at each corner of the dance floor, each holding a different kind of entertainer inside. Topping it all off were centrepieces made of pure candy.

"It was unbelievable," says Goldfarb. "The client really wanted the wow factor and it was great to make their dream come true."

McMurtry, whose company is best known for producing the Mr DJ show, also had a New York city-style nightclub involved, but they had a much larger and more theatrical type twist.

The bat mitzvah was held on two soundstages at the Toronto film studio and instead of doing the traditional candlelighting and speeches, the family used their theatre skills and acted out a live show. The bat mitzvah girl performed several numbers, including one from Britney Spears, one from Madonna and a Sonny and Cher impression with her dad. Also onstage were six other live dancers and other members of the family. After the performance, one of the stages was converted into a mock of a famous nightclub. The elevator between both soundstages was filled with a cloud of mist.

While McMurtry says the event was really impressive, the party faced an additional challenge, as it was due to take place only days after the Sept. 11 attacks.

PARTY PATROL

Linen company a pro at outfitting any party

By ERIN SILVER
Special to The CJN

Linens, an important party of any party, shouldn't be overlooked.

Shauna Abikzir, who runs Premier Linens (905-737-3497) with her husband Justin, is a pro at outfitting any party with a variety of linens.

These include such items as chair covers, napkins, tablecloths and overlays (a chiffon sheer that is placed over tablecloths).

Established in 1999 and located at Bathurst and Elgin Mills, Premier Linens caters to a range of functions, including corporate events, weddings and bar mitzvahs.

"We have a huge variety of coloured linens, from white to loud, crazy colours," says Abikzir.

"We've got everything from pastels and primary colours to patterned cloths."

Abikzir is in tune with what's trendy.

"For bar mitzvahs, black linens with colourful splotches are the new craze."

For more elegantly-themed events, the most popular linens are gold and ivory.

"We just got in a silvery-purple colour and people really like it," she says with enthusiasm.

Abikzir's knack for colours and her ability to co-ordinate aren't the only things that make her company special.

"Our variety makes the company unique," she says. "Our service is personalized. We try to develop a good relationship with clients and we also provide them with ideas and advice to help them make decisions."

Book at least a couple weeks in advance

Prices are competitive, with floor-length damask tablecloths starting at just $12.

It's no wonder that Premier is so busy, especially from May to the end of December.

"We do hundreds of parties a year," says Abikzir. "We probably do 20 to 30 parties a month and this weekend we're doing 10! There's one day in June when we have 15 functions!"

To accommodate all her clients – even those who order linens last minute or double their order the day of – Premier carries double the stock in popular items.

"We're always getting new products and growing," she says.

Still, it's best to book at least a couple of weeks in advance of the event. The company can accommodate parties of up to 1,000 people. No doubt, this is something to keep in mind when planning a function.

Other rental places advertising in this supplement are: Chair Decor, Etc. (905-731-9217); Chair-Man Mills Inc. (416-391-0400); D & D D'Amato Party Rent-All (416-665-9570); Micki's Linen (905-738-1161).

Toronto firms take home over half the awards

"It was quite an emotional week for the family," said McMurtry, who had a lot of trouble getting needed equipment out of New York. "The family was deeply saddened and moved, but they followed Guliani's advice and continued on."

Thankfully for "The Karens," as they're known in the industry, tragedy and disaster didn't stand in their way. Instead, Up & Coming Events took their enthusiasm and creativity and produced a visually beautiful wedding which, according to Jacobs, "was a magical night beyond perfection."

First time win for McMurtry.

Held at the Art Gallery of Toronto, guests entered onto a six-inch thick carpet of white rose pedals. As they walked toward the chupah, musicians of all varieties performed near the works of art. The chupah was created by hanging white sheer fabric from floor to ceiling and up-lighting it. Guests ate their dinner around square tables with centrepieces of hundreds of red roses woven into tree branches. Tea lights hung from the branches and bands of all genres of music played throughout the night.

"It was tremendously and logistically magnificent. It wasn't garish or overdone but tasteful and a dream come true," says Jacobs. "It was breathtaking."

After 13 years in business, the partners were happy to be recognized for doing something they love.

"This is somethig we do because we have a passion for it," says Garscadden. "Getting recognized is a round of applause. It's like getting an Academy Award."

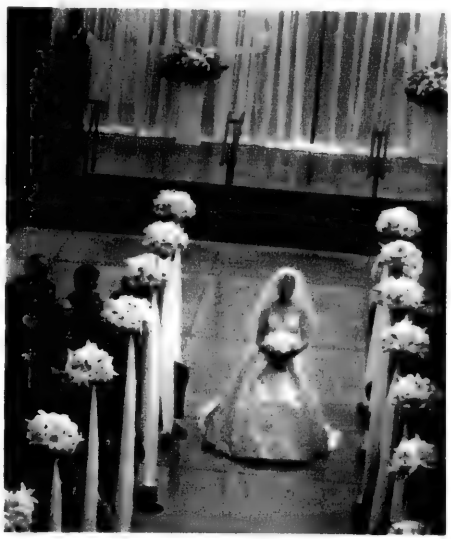
The staff at Bash Productions, almost a decade younger than Up & Coming Events, says this award has given them even more fuel to continue producing and growing.

"The fact that we were looked upon in that light makes us happy. In two years we were able to accomplish this. Now we want to go further," says Goldfarb.

McMurtry's company had been nominated twice before, but this was their first time winning. Clearly thrilled, McMurtry brought confetti poppers on stage and released them as he made his acceptance speech to the crowd.

"It was all quite impressive," says McMurtry about his acceptance shenanigans.

Stacy Wyatt, the editor of Canadian Event Perspective Magazine and founder of Stark Communications, which sponsors the awards, was particularly impressed with these three winners.



Up & Coming Events won for this "magical night."

"These three were all unique, talented and deserving," says Wyatt. "Bash Productions in particular was so young and what they did logistically was amazing."

The CEIA is a national awards program that isn't limited to members of any particular association. Companies must submit a lenghty and detailed package explaining the event they produced. There are 30 categories, including; outstanding achievement in special events, meeting managements, conference planning and exhibition management.

Overall, Toronto based companies took home half of the awards presented.

Choose your venue well in advance of party

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

There are so many party venues nowadays that selecting the right one is a task in itself. But Joe Cosentino of the Columbus Centre (416-789-7011 ext. 298) and Ellen Waldman of Shaarei Tefillah Congregation (416-787-1631) can offer some helpful tips.

Before choosing, they advise consider what kind of setting you want: Extravagant or modest? Elegant or casual? And what guests are you inviting: Family? Friends? Business associates?

In Cosentino's experience, events often change tone part of the way through. Some corporate events begin like a sales meeting or seminar, then turn into a party. Other meetings stay businesslike throughout. And at a bar or bat mitzvah, while the ceremony is decorous, a party atmosphere holds sway later.

Consider factors like this before talking to your event planner, Cosentino urges, then have a session with your planner to hash through details. Look at venues far ahead of booking, using referrals to narrow the range, and when you meet the manager of a venue, bring your planner with you.

In large part, Cosentino sees himself as a consultant. "By the time you come to me, much of my selling work is done," he says. "That's why you're here."

This means you can devote your time with him to particulars, he says, so be organized enough to give him as much detail as you can – or at least some notes highlighting your priorities, or perhaps a bridal magazine checklist as a guide.

For a wedding, Waldman recommends booking a venue eight to nine months ahead. Cosentino advises at least a year for a wedding in a high-demand month like June. Likewise for a bar or bat mitzvah, but since birthdays aren't always in high-demand seasons, it may be easier to get the venue you want.

Waldman and Cosentino both place high value on flexibility. A locale that's suitable for any gathering, large or small, formal or intimate, will be able to serve you for future events, as well as the one you're planning now.

While the Columbus Centre is an Italian cultural centre, Cosentino takes pride in working well with different cultures and customs. Flexibility, for him, includes serving any size, or kind, of gathering, from 12 to 400. It might also include touches like using the centre's gym for a volleyball game after a corporate event.

Waldman cites the menu as an example of the importance of adaptability. It should appeal to kids, as well as adults – not just for simchahs like bar or bat mitzvahs, where the boy or girl is the honoured guest, but for any all-ages or family-oriented event. Also, it should allow for special dietary needs.

Cosentino and Waldman agree that repeat customers aren't only good for the venue itself. You – the host – will always be welcomed by people who have served you before and know your preferences.

Shaarei Tefillah Congregation

As a community institution, Waldman says, a shul is not only friendly, but family-oriented. Strong loyalties and continuity are conducive to good service, says Waldman, who has been a lifelong member of Shaarei Tefillah.

Other attributes to look for include friendly staff who give good, hands-on service, both Waldman and Cosentino advise. They should be knowledgeable and able to recommend professionals for services not available on site.

Easy access is another issue, Waldman adds. Shaarei Tefillah, for its part, offers the advantages of being easily accessible to travellers (near the 401) and the elderly (near Baycrest), as well as people with disabilities. Waldman recommends hiring security, which can be arranged through the shul.

Waldman also urges you to pay close attention to a hall's acoustics. For all the wonders of a state-of-the-art sound system, a hall designed before such systems were commonplace will likely be better built to carry both the music and the speeches.

As well, she advises, look for good basic decor that's tasteful but allows you to add your own touches.

Other food/where to party places are: Acqua Ristorante & Bar (416-368-7171); Baycrest Hospitality Services (Kosher) (416-785-2500 ext 2477); Beth Tikvah Synagogue (Kosher) (416-221-3433); Casa Loma (416-923-1171); Comedywood Uptown (905-761-0543); Delimark Catering (905-474-9930); The Fairmont Royal York (416-368-2511, ext. 2657); Hudson's Bay Catering (416-861-6138); Inn On The Park (Kosher) (416-444-2561); Four Seasons Hotel (Kosher) (416-964-0411); Liberty Grand (416-542-3789); Estates of SunnyBrook (416-487-3841); Match Bar & Grill (905-850-5699); Meron Banquets (905-669-0777); Ontario Science Centre (416-696-3150); Park Hyatt Toronto (Kosher) (416-925-1234); Pickle Barrel (416-493-4444); Regal Constellation Hotel (Kosher) (416-675-1500); Regency Banquet Centre (Kosher) (905-851-2325); Rose Lazar Catering (Kosher) (416-633-0344); The Royalton Banquet & Convention Centre (Kosher) (905-851-2325); Sam Firestone Caterers (Kosher) (416-782-8022); Scaramouche Restaurant/Pasta Bar (416-961-8011); Shangri-La Banquet Hall (416-475-6571); Toronto Centre for the Arts (416-250-3713); Spirale Banquet Hall & Ristorante (416-391-5888); Toronto Marriott Eaton Centre (416-597-9200); TriElm Catering (Kosher) (416-222-1230); Windsor Arms (Kosher) 416-971-9666).

Interactive entertainment: no matter how high-tech, it's still about people

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

The phrase "interactive entertainment" is often linked with new technology. A computer game is called interactive, whereas passively watching a screen is not.

Ultimately, though, entertainment involves people, so it's really interactive when performers at an event get the guests to join in the fun. To make this happen, says Jian Magen of Magen Boys Entertainment (905-764-2100), you need a DJ who radiates positive energy. Erick Bouaziz of Starr Productions (905-707-8211) shares this view.

"An entertainer belongs out on the floor with the guests, not onstage or on a dance cube," Bouaziz says.

However, he cautions, an entertainer should do this without becoming the centre of attention. He's not the star; that role belongs to the host.

Look for a DJ with a track record, says Magen. Talk to friends with tastes similar to yours, find out what entertainers they've enjoyed, and then go see them in person.

Bouaziz, who is booked into 2004, says that the sooner you book your entertainers, the better. Magen, who has bookings into 2005, agrees. Eight months to a year ahead is best, though he says he has some flexibility.

As to qualities you should look for, Magen ranks talent and service as tied for first place, "with talent just a bit ahead." He adds that the ability to improvise is important too, as are versatility and a wide repertory.

The bigger the event, the more an entertainer needs a whole range of qualities. Bouaziz stresses the importance of picking someone who has fun with the guests, is organized enough to know what's happening next, has good timing, and works well with other professionals such as the videographer and the caterer.

Your entertainers should never be idle, Bouaziz says. "We have no dead air," he says of his company. You don't want music during a speech, for example, but as a friend of the host stands up to say a few words, the musicians might play That's What Friends are For.

On Magen's list of priorities, novelties, gimmicks and fads come last. Granted, they can be fun, he says, and they add interesting effects. But if a DJ can't do without them, he's not a good DJ.

Nevertheless, some novelties are especially fun. Bouaziz mentions sky dancers – big dolls made of parachute material that dances as air moves through them; "flame blowers," – cloths that appear to be on fire as a fan blows air through them while lights play over their surface; and dance cubes lit up from inside.

The team of performers from Starr Productions.

Another visual effect Bouaziz likes is produced by a box truss set up around a dance floor. A lot like a tent frame, but with lights, it creates the effect of setting the room apart, making it a special place in its own right.

TWIRLY PLAYING

For speeches that will do you proud, it's worth hiring a pro

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

We all know that elected officials and other public figures use speechwriters. Great speeches can move people, even nations, but how many of us have the oratorical skills of Abraham Lincoln or Winston Churchill? Moses himself, we are told, was no orator.

Nonetheless, you have within you the potential for a speech that will do you proud. This is the conviction of Esther Turner of Your Word'sWorth (905-508-7035; iwrite4u@pathcom.com) and Joanne Brodkin of Well Spoken (905-760-0073; jolebro@yahoo.com).

Their mission is to make that potential real.

Turner says selecting a speechwriter is a very personal process, and urges you to choose someone who will give you original, unique work. Brodkin agrees that every client is different. Some have good ideas but don't know how to articulate them. Some want to be funny, others are more serious.

A speechwriter, says Turner, should offer a free consultation in person, and show you samples as well as references. Rather than meet you at her office, she makes a point of going to your home, to get to know you more personally.

Joanne Brodkin delivers a Well Spoken speech

Turner thinks most people are afraid of the limelight; they'd prefer "strolling naked in a mall or overpaying Revenue Canada" to giving a speech. And simchahs are stressful enough as is. In her view, the way to deal with the anxiety is to be prepared.

People often treat speeches as something necessary but burdensome, to get through but not to be enjoyed. Turner and Brodkin want to change this "bad rap"; they treat speeches as integral parts of the event's entertainment.

As Brodkin says, "A speech should help set the mood and enhance a good ambience."

You have to grab the guests' attention right away, Brodkin says. To this end, she puts a high value on humour. It goes with a simchah, it makes it easier for you to relax and it's fun for the speechwriter.

At the same time, Brodkin adds, because a speech is in someone's honour, the jokes have to be respectful of the person and the event. Depending on the person, they shouldn't tease too much. Personal matters, Brodkin and Turner agree, must be treated with delicacy and taste.

Turner ascribes people's difficulty with speeches to their thinking that their lives are uninteresting. But, she says, the opposite is true: "There's a biography in everyone." She attempts to use insight and people skills to find her clients' essence – "the funny and the heartfelt" within a person – and embody this in the speech.

Shopping for children doesn't have to be a chore

By ERIN SILVER
Special to The CJN

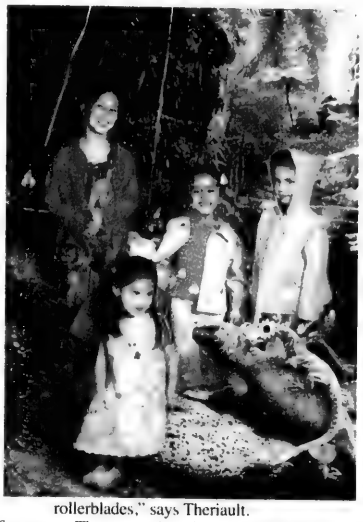
Shopping for children can be exhausting, as any parent knows.

Thankfully, Bon Lieu (416-963-9703) knows just what children need.

Since 1986, Bon Lieu has been making it quick and easy for parents to dress children for any occasion.

Located at 890 Yonge St. near Davenport, Bon Lieu carries a wide selection of imported children's clothing.

Whether they need an outfit to play in the park or are going to a black tie event, Bon Lieu has the clothing to suit it.



"We're a multi-banner store, which means we carry a lot of different makes," says store manager Nicole Theriault.

"We have casual clothes for going to school and we also carry suits and tuxedos in newborn sizes to size 18," she says.

Lacoste is a sporty/dressy make for boys. A make called "M" from France has a line of dressy clothing for boys, which is similar to Armani for men, explains Theriault.

"We have Mimi from Italy, which makes traditionally dressy clothes, such as pants, vests and shirts."

Similarly, for girls, clothes are imported from Europe.

"We have fancy party dresses from David Charles in England. We are the only ones in North America who carry a line called Taki-To, from Austria," she says.

And there's no need to worry about finding the right items and sizes on your own.

"We have expert staff here to help clients find exactly what they need."

Shoes are also a necessity for any occasion.

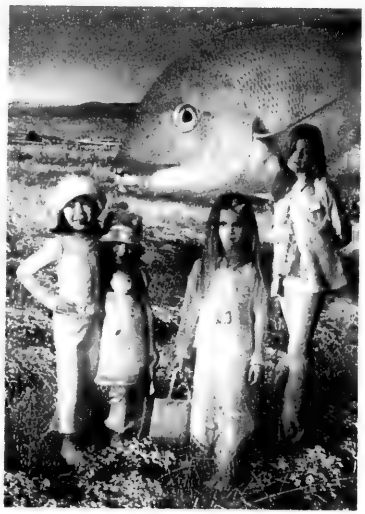
Luckily, the owner of Bon Lieu also owns a chain of children's footwear stores, called Petit Pied. One of these stores is located 2651 Yonge St., between Eglinton and Lawrence. Another is opening in Bayview Village in July, and yet another is located right next door to Bon Lieu.

"At Petit Pied, we have runners, rubber boots, sandals, slippers dress shoes and even rollerblades," says Theriault.

They carry them in European sizes 18 to 40.

With all this selection and convenience, shopping for children doesn't get any easier.

Other kids' clothing places advertising in this supplement are: Beatties (416-481-4459); Crawford Boys (416-782-8137); Zero 20 Bambini (905-851-6041).



Bon Lieu carries lots of different makes of children's clothing.

It is better to give than receive

By ADAM GRACHNIK
Special to The CJN

Like Bubbie and Zaide say, giving is always better than receiving. However, who can honestly ever find the right gift to give? Thankfully, The Liss Gallery (416-787-9872) and The Earring Gallery (905-763-2210) have wonderful and creative gift ideas for any frustrated gift giver.

The Liss Gallery has two locations in Toronto, 978 Eglinton Ave. and 176 Yonge St. First started in 1983, the gallery promotes Canadian and international art. Specializing in contemporary fine art, original paintings, photography, sculpture and limited edition prints, according to Brian Liss it offers people very personal gifts.

"People are more comfortable buying art as a gift," said Liss. "Art used to be too personal to be bought as a gift, but now people like it because it is very personal."

The Earring Gallery has been in business for four years and is another venue where gift-buyers can pick up a personal gift.

"Earrings are all different, some are more modern than others," says Renne Ackermann of the Earring Gallery. "It's a very personalized thing. People should look for things that suit them, suit their style, suit their look."

Ackermann maintains her store is a unique experience for people who choose to shop there. The store specialize in earrings of 10, 14, 18 karat gold for adults, but they also have a kids' corner that appeals to young people.

Both businesses understand that gift buying is not easy for most people. Therefore, to combat a potentially frustrating time, each store has made a commitment to help out their customers to the utmost of their ability.

"Each person is walked through various sections of store," says Ackermann. "We try and understand the person they are buying for."

Liss says his workers also try to understand the person who will be receiving the gift.

"We first find out what the person is comfortable spending and then we try to understand their lifestyle," he says. "There truly is something for everyone here."

Each store must work hard to keep up with people's changing tastes. The Liss Gallery offers bas metal works, which use lasers to cut images onto steel. As well, they open their gallery on Eglinton up for private parties or one-man art shows.

Ackermann explained that her store offers the newest trend, Huggies – a small concept earring that actually hugs the ear so you don't have to use the painful bar in the back.

As well, in Ackermann's industry, things change quickly, with new styles being introduced all the time.

"Large hoops were not so popular four years ago, but now [they are] popular," she says of the changing trends. "Large chop earrings are also popular now. We really try hard to keep up with fashions."

Ackerman doesn't find it tough to keep up. By always sterilizing the earrings, she allows customers to try them on before they purchase them. This makes any confused consumer a little more comfortable.

> You should look for something that is meaningful

Liss, who says he loves art because it is so emotional, truly loves what he does and uses his passion for his work to sum up the true secret behind gift giving.

"We live in a world where it is challenging to buy a gift. You should look for something that is meaningful," he says.

People should follow Liss' lead and not just buy for the sake of buying, but truly think and pour their hearts into their purchases.

For gentle fun, draw on Mark Ciale's talent

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

There are a lot of ways to add personal touches to your special event. Some of them are high-tech and complex; others are simpler, but just as much fun.

For caricaturist Mark Ciale (416-203-2514), the most fun is the drawing itself. Almost equal to the drawing is the pleased smiles of the party's guests.

A caricature, as Ciale creates them, is a likeness, but one with a humorous look that pokes gentle fun. A caricature is like a cartoon portrait in that it exaggerates salient features, but while a cartoon can depict an imaginary figure, a caricature has a real person for its subject.

Ciale studied fine art at Ontario College of Art (now the Ontario College of Art and Design), and respects formal art instruction, but he puts an even higher premium on "elbow grease." In his opinion, the best way to develop a skill is through application. Ciale has honed his skills through 13 years' experience, including five years at Ontario Place. An accomplished all-round artist, he also paints, and has had two gallery shows.

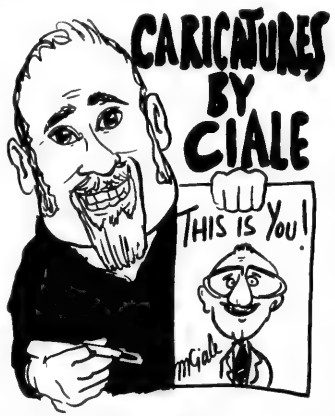
Now Ciale uses his skills mainly on the party circuit, working at events from bar and bat mitzvahs and receptions to corporate functions. You can see him at work at almost any size or type of event, from an intimate dinner with a dozen guests to a trade show with hundreds of participants.

Usually, the signing board at a bar or bat mitzvah has a photo of the boy or girl whose special day it is. Sometimes, these days, there's a caricature portrait by Ciale instead. People are starting to catch on to the fact that a caricaturist can play a special role at a simchah.

Any party with a large number of teenagers runs the risk of getting rowdy. At a bar mitzvah, a caricaturist offers a kind of fun in keeping with the event. Seeing him at work, young guests will stand still for a time and watch or talk to him, too absorbed to kick up their heels.

A caricaturist at a corporate event has almost the opposite effect, that of loosening things up. Everyone has suffered through the awkward stiffness that can take the fun out of such functions. A caricaturist, in Ciale's experience, can help people relax.

At one sales conference with people from all over the continent, for example, his caricatures were an ice breaker for people who had never met. Caricatures also make great office presents for going-away parties and other occasions.



A caricature will often include themes, for example, from sports or entertainment, that are favourites with the subject. Ciale treats these themes with humour: a dentist, for example, might be shown pulling teeth with a huge pair of pliers.

His caricatures of children are very gentle and affirming. With adults, Ciale is somewhat more satirical: they can take a bit more of being teased.

At first, some people are shy about having a caricature drawn: they don't want to be made fun of. Ciale's style is so gentle, though, that he's seen many shy people change their minds.

Ciale works very swiftly, completing 12 to 15 drawings in an hour. At this speed, every guest who wants one can get one.

A good caricaturist, he says, resembles any entertainer, in that he enjoys being in company. Since he's in the midst of the guests, he should also be personable, like to chat a little and be able to work without becoming distracted.

People often keep his pictures as souvenirs and frame them, Ciale says. In this way, his talent is its own best advertising: people show his work to their friends, who then spread the word. In addition to word-of-mouth, you can also book Ciale through an event planner.

Another caricaturist advertising in this supplement is Chris Klein, (416-391-3774).

Flowers: Arrangements more conservative

By ERIN SILVER
Special to The CJN

Bursts of creativity explode in her mind each time she approaches a new project.

That's just one of many things people love about Elaine Birnbaum, owner of Greenleaves and Petals (905-709-4080), located at Yonge and Steeles in Thornhill.

Established in 1983, Birnbaum and her staff create bridal bouquets and bouquets of fresh flowers, which can be ordered on their Web site (www.greenleavesandpetals.com) or picked up at their store.

But Greenleaves and Petals focuses on much more than just floral arrangements.

A graphic artist by training, Birnbaum also dreams up and delivers creative non-floral pieces including signage and candle lighting.

"We do centrepieces, balloons and backdrops, co-ordinate linens and provide chair covers," says Birnbaum, whose warmth and sincerity emanate through the phone.

"We like to transform the whole room."

In fact, she and her staff, which includes a multi-award-winning head designer, transform hundreds of rooms each year.

Whether they're providing a simple bouquet of flowers for an anniversary or event planning for corporate party, bar mitzvah, wedding or theme party, clients can be assured that Greenleaves and Petals won't disappoint.

"We like to maintain very high customer service," says Birnbaum. "We listen to customers, tailor our creations to suit anybody's budget and we follow through."

She has a philosophy that makes every client feel reassured.

"It's important to be able to provide everything to your customer, no matter what the size of their party or what their order. We make them feel like theirs is the one," explains Birnbaum.

"It's their special day."

As for trends, these days, flower arrangements and room décor are becoming more conservative.

"People are coming back to simplistic elegance. People are also celebrating more and more in their homes."

A floral arrangement by Greenleaves and Petals.

But simplistic elegance doesn't mean that every function looks alike.

"We're unique because we have a European flair," Birnbaum says. "No two functions are the same. We're very creative and we maintain a specialty with each client."

Busy year round, it's best to book well in advance, though Birnbaum notes that now, people are booking closer to their function.

"People like to look around and get a sense of what they want. Often, they don't know what they want until their function is around the corner," she says.

That's when Birnbaum can sit down with clients to discuss the event, and that's when the creative process gets underway.

Making sure that every event runs as planned, Greenleaves and Petals is well staffed, and Birnbaum likes to pop in at every function she's involved in.

That's the recipe for creativity and caring, all in one shop.

Consultants can help prevent simchah headaches

By ADAM GRACHNIK
CJN Intern

The headaches, hassle and stress of planning a simchah can turn a happy time into one filled with aggravations. To prevent this, many people seek out consultants, who can help do everything from organizing the smallest task to planning an entire affair.

Judy Stein of Judy Stein Consulting (905-764-2728), Rickie Bessner from Rickie Bessner Party Planning (905-731-2005) and Marsha Baker from Cherry and Baker (905-764-7121) have been planning other people's parties for years and know what a good consultant can add.

"There is no course at York [University] that has party planning for Jewish weddings," says Stein with a laugh. "I am the insurance for a party. You are buying yourself the right to enjoy your party. It is peace of mind."

Baker agrees, saying she is "there to ensure that the party runs stress-free and smoothly."

Bessner says she is hired to ensure the simchah will be a hit. "I will worry about every last detail by making the family feel that they can rely on me."

After planning parties for as long as they have, the women have each experienced some party disasters in which they were needed to calm the situation.

Stein recalls one simchah where the ushers all fainted and another where she almost had to break up a fistfight between the florist and photographer.

Consultants help prevent simchah headaches

Baker says she once had a bridesmaid who couldn't find her dress, but, she says with a laugh, "we fixed it all and it all worked out fine."

Over the years, the party industry has changed to provide more options and choices to make each event different from the rest.

"It has grown by leaps and bounds," says Bessner, who has worked in many sectors of the party industry, including spending some time with a DJ company. "[The industry today] is more innovative and creative. There are new venues popping up everywhere and some of the facilities are just awesome."

Stein, who has been in the business for 24 years, says that, compared to years past, "there are not as many restrictions. Things are a lot freer and there is more experimenting.

"It used to be mothers that planned everything, but it's the bride and groom that do it now," she says.

"There is so much out there that people are almost intimidated," says Baker, a former makeup artist and mother of five daughters. "You don't have to feel compelled to do everything."

All three consultants agree that the secret to a being a good consultant is personality.

Stein says humour is really important when stress and emotions are running high.

"Most good consultants can read their clients," adds Bessner. "You become a friend and get to know people on a personal and private level. [You also have to] make sure you are both on the same page and you both click."

There are many consultants in the industry and Bessner urges people to shop around.

"You really have to find someone you like," she says. "Word of mouth and experience are important. Give yourself at least three choices."

Baker adds that people should interview their consultants and meet with different ones until they find one they are comfortable with.

"It is really important that they like me and feel comfortable," she says.

What to wear, what to wear?

By ERIN SILVER
Special to The CJN

Finding a va-va-va-voom dress for that special occasion is often stressful. Luckily, there are some Toronto stores that take the pain out of shopping.

Two of them are The Emmanuel Bitini Fashion Outlet (416-782-3211) and the Ross Mayer Showroom (416-703-4361).

The Emmanuel Bitini Fashion Outlet on Orfus Road, owned by Andre Abitbol and his wife Miryam, has been named in Toronto Life magazine's shoestring guide for the past five years and carries a wide selection of clothing for women.

"We carry suits, dresses for special occasions, coats, tops and other everyday clothes," says Andre.

During the busy summer season, their stock includes a variety of formal wear, such as prom dresses.

"We carry a lot of designer names and we have the best selection in town," he says.

He says their prices are much cheaper than anywhere else and that customers can expect to receive 20 to 60 per cent off brand new merchandise.

Andre is also very proud of the outlet's service.

"We have excellent service," he says. "We have professional girls who help women pick out their clothes, coordinate outfits and help them find what they're looking for.

"If something doesn't look right we'll tell them to take it off. Our staff are very knowledgeable and our clients like that."

The store caters to a large Jewish clientele aged 16 and up, including professional women and those looking for clothes they can wear on a daily basis. Sizes range from 4 to 18.

There is an offsite seamstress who does alterations at "very reasonable prices" and she's located just two blocks from Emmanuel Bitini.

Ross Mayer, the owner and designer of the Ross Mayer Showroom, offers a host of women's clothing from their King and Bathurst location.

"We offer everything from day time wear, career suiting, cocktail outfits, bar mitzvah fashions and eveningwear," says Mayer, who designs a range of clothing from tailored pieces to knit sweaters to leather coats.

"I create wonderful designs with clean, simple lines using European fabrics. I'm interested in materials with texture and colour," he says, noting that he wants his clients to go away with unique outfits that can't be found in other clothing lines and stores.

"My best-selling suit is a little Moulin Rouge corset-inspired jacket with leather trim."

Paired with wide-leg cuffed trousers, clients will achieve a slick urban look they can wear to the office or a special function.

For the evening, Mayer offers a raw silk wrap-style vest with a long fish-tail evening skirt in a range of colours.

He describes prices as being in the mid to upper range.

In addition to having ready-to-wear clothing in sizes 2 to 16, Mayer also does custom work to accommodate clients.

"I can work with clients' own designs or remake existing designs in different sizes and materials. I also do bridal work that is simple, elegant and modern."

He says his staff are trained in the business and create a laidback, unintimidating environment.

PARTY PLANNER

For a party band, love isn't enough

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Most musicians play because they love performing, says Mickey Lewin of The Ultimate Sound (905-881-7972), and he and Jordan Klapman of Klapman's Klezmer Band (416-588-0854) say they both enjoy their work. However, they both also insist that for a party band, a love of music isn't enough.

You don't want a band with ego, Lewin says. They're there for you and your guests, they're not giving a Skydome concert. Klapman says that empathy with your guests even outweighs talent. Experience and practice, he believes, can compensate for modest talent.

Consider your guests' ages and backgrounds, says Lewin. Kids and adults have different tastes; so do people of different backgrounds, like North Americans and Israelis.

Then, Lewin says, there's venue and tone. Is your event in a hotel? a shul? a garden? a backyard? Is it formal or casual? Klapman advises hiring a band that has played your venue before or is willing to scout it out.

Lewin and Klapman agree that your band should tailor their music to your event, be versatile and well-organized, and have experience in dealing with the unexpected.

A "road-tested" band, in Klapman's phrase, will readily overcome contingencies like power outages and sudden downpours.

Lewin emphasizes that your band should have backup musicians and never miss a gig. Never hire a band that overbooks, he says and make sure you know exactly who will work at your party. If they can't make your date, they should say no and refer you to someone else.

Get references, Lewin says, and then come see a show. Klapman also advises getting references, but has reservations about seeing a band perform live. When you crash a party, stand backstage or peep around a door trying to look unobtrusive, you can't listen attentively. And while you're there, the band might not play what you need to hear. If you need a dance band but can't stay after the cocktails, talk to someone who's heard the band at a dance. It's better to hire a band you heard at a simchah to which you were invited, while you were relaxed.

If the band has a CD or a Web site, check it out, Klapman says. The Internet can be much like hearing them live, whereas a CD offers a wider repertory, and lets you listen at leisure.

Lewin recommends hiring a DJ and a band through one company. This saves time hiring and simplifies logistics: you only need one sound system, and transitions from band to DJ are easier with one leader. And, he says, this way is less costly.

The mix of live and DJ music varies from party to party, Lewin says. At a bar mitzvah, you'll want a live band for the adults, and a DJ for the kids. Lewin says that in his experience, kids are very particular. If they have an exact song list, pick a band that will follow it.

Also insist on a good sound system, he says; many guests are sensitive to sound. Some bands own their system while some rent. You're better off selecting a band that owns and takes care of its system.

The music should never be so loud you have to yell, Klapman says. Even during the dancing, you should be able to talk with your guests.

As for when to hire a band, book them the moment you have a date, Lewin says: the sooner, the better. Remember that of the 52 weeks in a year, only about 30 are good: the others are too close to dates such as Jewish holidays.

A varied repertory, Lewin says, is more fun for band and guests alike, though most bands have specialties. While The Ultimate Sound plays many genres of music, their forte is Jewish, mainly Israeli and klezmer styles; they also have male and female singers and dancers.

Klapman's specialty is obvious, but he also likes standards with universal, lasting appeal that can be performed many different ways. It depends on the band, he believes, more than the song.

A band that interacts with guests, Klapman says, is more fun. He encourages requests, lets musicians among the guests sing or play a song on stage and likes to see people dance in the aisles.

Klapman links klezmer music's popularity to the roots revival in the larger community: people want to know their cultural origins. Roots music is simple in form, speaks directly to feelings and invites participation.

On the other hand, Klapman says, just playing old songs in old ways would make the music very stiff. Keeping the tradition alive means preseving the roots yet letting the branches grow.

Caterer gives customer full attention

By ERIN SILVER
Special to The CJN

Looking for a catering company that can dish out any meal and solve all your menu dilemmas?

Look no further than Caterers York/Sweet York Desserts (416-783-4293) and Fine Touch Catering (905-889-2690, ext. 2117).

Owned by Sharon Firestone and Bill Batista, Caterers York and Sweet York Desserts can put together menus and devise desserts for any occasion, whether it be a wedding, bar mitzvah, corporate party or engagement party.

For instance, appetizers on a sample menu include butternut squash soup, sushi and antipasto, while main course menus feature Peking duck with berry chutney, fillet of beef, salmon or chicken breast in phyllo with wild mushroom jus.

The dessert menu is just as diverse and delicious. It includes mouth-watering items, such as crêpes, truffles and chocolate mousse tortes, to name just a small sampling.

"We create the whole meal, including desserts, the sweet table and the wedding cake. We keep current and are always sure to keep up with the latest trends," says Firestone, whose father began the business in 1955.

Owned by Allan Brearley, Fine Touch Catering is located in the Reena Foundation Building on Clark Ave. near Bathurst St. The three-and-a-half-year-old company caters to corporate parties, engagement parties, weddings at a home and Shabbat dinners.

"This Friday night we're catering to a Shabbat dinner for 100 people and people are always coming in on Fridays to pick up meals for their Shabbat dinners," says Brearley.

He says that clients are very health-conscious these days, and he's come up with a variety of delicious dinners that fit the bill.

"Our grilled dijonnaise chicken is barbecued and roasted. It's lean and very popular."

So is his maple smoked chicken, also barbecued and roasted. And starting in June, kosher sushi will be on the menu.

Acting as the onsite caterer of Reena and with all his offsite jobs, Brearley is always on the move.

So is Firestone. As the in-house caterers at Beth Tzedec synagogue and one of the caterers at the Pride of Israel and Beth Tikvah, Firestone is always busy. She also caters house parties and arranges for much more than just food.

"We also figure out what rentals are needed and we order everything, including chairs and tables," she says.

Wait staff are also provided.

Every party gets their utmost attention, says Firestone, from the initial meeting when the menu is discussed to the day of the event.

"We're always on site and very involved," she says. "There isn't anything we wouldn't do to make sure the party is a success, even if we pitch in and wait on tables. We treat every event as if it was a party for ourselves."

Prices range depending on the menu. Clients can book through the synagogue, and some book up to a year in advance.

Clients are health-conscious and Caterers York accommodates this.

Caterers York offers retail desserts by order. Custom-made cakes require 48 hours notice while special order cakes require 10 days to two weeks advance notice.

No doubt, this company, which caters to parties as large as 500 people, is unique.

"Our company is special because we've been in existence a long time and our reputation stands for quality," says Firestone.

Fine Touch Catering is special as well.

"We aim to please, we're easy to get along with and we take into account the special needs of clients," Brearley says.

"Our food is good, our service is good and our menus are different than what people are used to seeing at other kosher caterers."

He says his prices are very reasonable.

No matter which of these caterers you choose, your party is sure to be a sweet success!

Another kosher caterer advertising in this supplement are Miriam's Table Catering (416-633-6554).

Party supplies are 'the finishing touches'

By ADAM GRACHNIK
CJN Intern

Whether it's a light show, a life-size balloon structure or a cotton candy machine, some of the most memorable simchahs are the ones with great party supplies.

Sam Cohen of Balloon Bash (905-707-8177) and Jack Schnoll of Kosher 'N Natural (416-789-7173) both try to add that extra special something to a party.

"We are the finishing touches on a party," said Schnoll of his business that in 20 years has grown from a small candy store to a business offering kosher candy, snow cones, cotton candy, centrepieces and balloons. "It is the extra, the cherry on top."

Cohen, a certified balloon artist (CBA) who has completed a comprehensive certification program to become a member of the U.S.-based Qualatex Balloon Network, says balloons are "extremely" important to a good party.

"Balloons are vibrant, they fill the room and provide colour motivation. They are very necessary."

Cohen once created three giant motor vehicles out of balloons: a motorcycle, Porsche and a Sea-Doo. Altogether, they "totalled well over 10,000 balloons," he says proudly.

'We listen to you and go out of our way to be really flexible'

Schnoll says there are no rules to follow when thinking about party supplies.

"It is all about personal preference. Everyone has their own taste," he says.

Nevertheless, he highlights a trend called "smash cakes," a slab of cake that you can smash and then use the tiny pieces for dessert on a dessert table.

Both companies try to keep things as simple as possible for people planning their parties.

"We try to provide a one-stop shop," Cohen says of his balloon company. "We try to cater to them, so they get as much as possible. We do everything."

Scholl echoed Cohen's remarks.

"We listen to you and go out of our way to be really flexible," he says. "We are out there to please."

Party supplies are always in high demand, so Cohen recommends that people come and visit him at least three months in advance.

Schnoll says that he is already booking for April 2003.

Other one-stop party supply stores advertising in this supplement are: Dominion Smallwares (416-665-9526); Tyme to Party (905-737-2789).

Mandell keep getting bigger – and better

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN

Mandell Entertainment Group (905-886-4000) is in the midst of a major expansion program.

In April, the 11-year-old the company opened a new banquet facility – the York Theatre on Eglinton Avenue near Yonge Street. The three-storey facility has a 1600-person capacity and can seat 500 people for dinner.

In May, Mandell also purchased The Prop House, a 40,000-square-foot facility that specializes in film and television sets and props that can be used for different theme parties.

Now called The Prop Factory, it's the largest prop company in Canada, says Corey Mandell, president of Mandell Entertainment Group. "There's 40,000 square feet of unbelievable stuff. We have anything from the set of Moulin Rouge to Star Trek.

"We have life-size Oscars. We can design the exact set of the Oscars. We could bring the magic touch of Hollywood to any type of party."

Other props include life-size bears and tigers, rickshaws, palm trees, grass huts, horse and carriages and towns from old-style westerns.

Located at King Street and Dufferin Road, The Prop Factory can be viewed by appointment by calling the prop master at 416-588-7725.

"The large scale props and theme sets brings us to a whole new level of event decorating."

In addition, Mandell says the company will be opening up its Event Gallery for showcasing event themes. "The large scale props and theme sets brings us to a whole new level of event decorating."

Mandell also announced that he is teaming up with his brother Jeffrey Mandell, a lawyer with an MBA, in this latest and other ventures.

Corey Mandell

And there are more changes in store for Mandell Entertainment. The company will soon be moving its headquarters from Richmond Hill to Avenue Road and Bloor Street. The new location will be directly above the venue of its next big venture – a restaurant and bar slated to open by the end of August.

Mandell envisions the restaurant as a modern lounge. "We'll be holding some intimate events there."

This will be the third party venue for Mandell Entertainment. The company also runs the Capitol Event Theatre at 2492 Yonge St. The restored art deco building can hold 600 to 800 people and can seat 250 for dinner.

"It's a great place to host events," says Mandell. "The community loves the Capitol because we saved the original integrity of the building."

The entertainment company founded by Corey Mandell in 1991 has come along way since it early days when it offered an interactive DJ service using a handful of DJs.

Today Mandell Entertainment is the country's largest DJ company. It has a staff of 350 people, from dancers and DJs to administrative staff for its many divisions. Mandell offers interactive DJ packages – with two DJs – that can be expanded to include dancers, as well as lighting and special effects such as fireworks and dry ice.

The amusement division MEGA: (Mandell Entertainment Group Amusements) rents out inflatable games, obstacle courses and inflatable water slides, and novelty food machines such as candy floss and snow cones. The rental includes an attendant.

The company also offers dance classes to the public for children and adults.

There are also private break dancing private classes, says Mandell. "Families come in before parties to learn routines."

In men's fashions, it's ascots and sharpaes, baby

By ADAM GRACHNIK
CJN Intern

For some, the most rewarding part of a party is dressing up, looking great and feeling even better.

Nick Alampi of Andrew's Formal Wear (416-783-8181) and John Strauss of Stars Men's Shop (416-650-1404) have been making ordinary people look smashing for years.

"I truly believe that when you look good, you feel good," says Strauss. "It makes me feel good to help people. You are kind of like a doctor, you are helping people feel good."

Alampi says he likes "helping people with their one perfect day. I like taking their vision or idea and putting it together.

"I love it when the groom sits back and looks at himself and really likes what he sees."

In the fashion industry, trends come and go and new looks are introduced every day, so both men keep their clients on top of style.

"Colours are really hot, neutral tones are hot," says Strauss, who has 21 stores across Ontario. "People are starting to dress up again. They really want to understand what elegance and business casual are."

Strauss adds that men are gravitating towards coloured dress shirts, pants without pleats, soft jackets, microfibres and four-button suits.

Alampi notes some other trends.

"Some of the latest fashions and newest and coolest looks are [in] ascots, the English version of a tie," he says, adding that "it's more puffy than a regular tie… almost like a scarf."

In terms of jackets, Alampi says the latest look "is a three-quarter length coat, which looks almost like a trench coat."

While Alampi says more traditional ties and knots will never go out of style, he notes there is a new kind of tie known as the "sharpae," which resembles traditional knots but is more crunched and wrinkled at the top.

Regardless of styles, it is never easy picking a suit, nor is it easy to drag a groom to the store, which is why both Andrew's and Stars have a strong focus on customer service.

"People come in, they sit down and they have an espresso or a cappuccino. We talk and give them friendly advice," Alampi says of his 35-year-old, family-run store. "When we talk, we know what to look for. When their personality comes out, we know what their true look will be."

Customers at Alampi's store can also enjoy watching a satellite television feed while they shop, and youngsters, or young-at-heart adults, can play video games on the store's Nintendo system.

Strauss stresses that his salespeople are well-trained and intelligent and know what questions to ask.

"When you come here you know there is someone who will care about you," says Strauss. "We are there to help the customer. We go out of our way to make you comfortable, so you have a good feeling and good value."

Whatever suit you choose, Alampi advises all customers to "wear what they feel comfortable with, be daring, be bold, but most importantly, be happy."

Party decor: anything goes as long as it's tasteful

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to the CJN

Party decor is no longer predictable: as long as it's safe and tasteful, anything goes.

Dean Northcott and Eldon Deroche's Bending Machine (416-530-2440), and Tammy Heisel's Artistic Creations (416-630-0750; www.tammyswebsite.ca), have benefited from this trend. Northcott was nicknamed "Dean, Dean, the bending machine" by the man who taught him to bend the tubes used in neon lighting. Hence the company name.

To create neon lighting, a tube is coated with phosphorus – light hitting different kinds of phosphorus makes different colours – and filled with neon gas. Electricity lights it up. Fluorescent light is neon with a wider tube and white light.

If the power's off, you can't tell what colour a tube produces. What's inside seems coated with white, so each tube is marked with a dot showing its colour. In the '70s, when neon only came in three or four colours, the advent of backlit signs seemed to spell its demise. No longer the malevolent "neon god" of Simon & Garfunkel's 1960s song The Sounds of Silence, it became a nostalgia object, snatched by collectors as fast as storekeepers dismantled it.

Today, neon is back. While the cumbersome old instllations were usually stationary, the new 12-volt transformers are so small that the tube slots into an 8x5-inch base as big as a cookie tin. All the equipment can fit in a crate and delivered to your party.

And the tube glass now has pigments for purer, brighter colours, in a wider variety. This, combined with the possible shapes of bent glass, opens up potential for neon as a medium of sculpture.

After five years in business, The Bending Machine has shapes for many themes: musical symbols, sports equipment and a magician's hat with a hand waving a bouquet of flowers. There are Jewish holiday items as well. The Bending Machine will make shapes to order.

PARTY PLANNER

Let these guys jump start your party

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

People often hail the advantages of hiring experienced party professionals, and they're right, as far as they go.

Sure, a company with staying power and a long list of repeat clients must be doing something right. But isn't there a danger they'll be set in their ways? What works for a person who likes the tried-and-true might not turn you on if you want a blast of fresh air.

One advantage of younger professionals is that they haven't earned their laurels yet. To prove themselves, they have to work harder, and smarter. The fewer gigs they have under their belt, the harder they have to try to get the next one.

Maybe your best option is to strike a balance of youth and experience.

There are plenty of entertainers and other professionals in their 20s and 30s, who are young enough not to be set in their thinking but who have done enough good work to be in the process of earning a good name.

Partners Sandor Nyman and Lorne Rapkin of Jump Entertainment (416-665-4103, www.jumpspecialevents.com), are young, with a fresh outlook and lots of original ideas. At the same time, they have 12 years of combined experience.

They can do "anything and everything that has to do with music," says Nyman. They want to branch into every sector of the business, combining promotions and entertainment. Their other company is Jump Promotions.

Sandor Nyman

Versatility is important. Even entertainers with a specialty can benefit from bringing in ideas from outside their field.

Jump Entertainment will play every kind of locale, from hotels and nightclubs to camps and shuls, as well as every kind of event, from bar mitzvahs to product launches.

They can bring in elevated dance floors and will work with dancers, comedians and singers, as well as themes and costumes.

Keeping your guests dancing and laughing for hours on end is a high-energy job, but Jump is a high-energy outfit.

"There's no stopping us," Nyman assures potential clients. "Let us jump into your next event."

Often, along with a DJ, Jump will have two MCs on the floor, mixing with guests and having fun.

Lorne Rapkin

Nyman and Rapkin like to see guests having a good time while they perform. But Jump won't be the stars: you will. If you, your family or your closest guests want to be in the dance or chorus routines, Jump welcomes you.

"If Jump has a good time," says Nyman, "your guests will have a better time."

Since you and your guests are there to enjoy the party, you'll want professionals who can take some of the organizational tasks off your hands. Free of charge, Jump will help co-ordinate your entertainment, and they'll do all the co-ordinating at a discount rate.

Whatever you need, be it a karaoke machine or security guards, Jump can arrange it. And at each party, they give away 10 free promotional prizes.

If budget is a consideration, Jump offers what Nyman calls "high-end entertainment for a relatively modest budget".

Book as far in advance as you can, Nyman advises. Being new, Jump has some open dates, but they're filling up, some as far ahead as 2005.

Speeches are an integral part of party's entertainment

Neither Turner nor Brodkin ask clients to prepare anything specific, except Turner asks for help in drawing your family tree, so she's familiar with the key people and their connection to you. She adds that it's useful for her to have a copy of the basic agenda for the party, which your planner can provide. All Brodkin asks is that you have a general idea of what you want in your speech, such as a theme, and of the tone you're looking for.

Look for someone who puts you at your ease and helps you develop your ideas, both Turner and Brodkin advise. And be open to suggestion and professional advice. For Turner, her work includes a rehearsal so you can deliver your speech flawlessly.

Word'sWorth's Esther Turner

Both Turner and Brodkin believe in adapting to your needs. Brodkin will write your entire speech, or improve on yours. Turner writes speeches for everyone if you want, including the MC; she will also co-ordinate music with speeches, or even script the entire evening.

As with any other professional, experience and reputation are essential qualities. Turner calls her work "a Catch-22 profession since ghostwriters rarely get referrals." However, she does get long-term repeat clients as families pass through milestones from births to anniversaries.

Brodkin, too, has plenty of experience. Though Well Spoken is a new company, she has been a public speaker for years as part of her community work, and was vice-president of Women's FEDERATION CJA in Montreal.

Suppose you don't decide until fairly late that you need a speech writer? It's never too late, Turner says, but she suggests booking six to eight weeks before the party, around the time you mail the invitations. Brodkin says a month is sufficient.

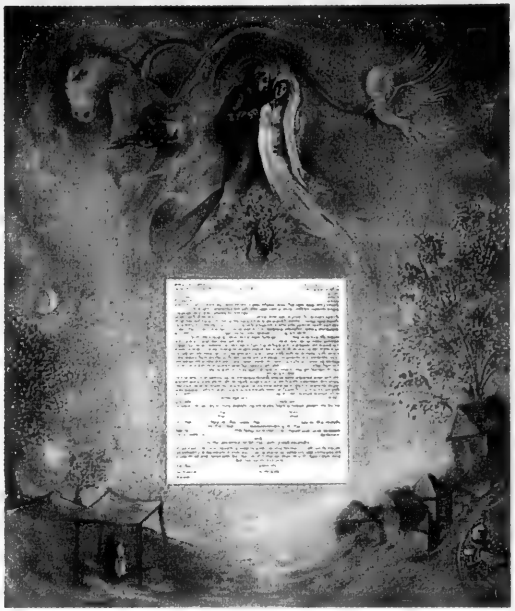
THE KETUBAH: A TRADITION REVIVED



LEFT: This extraordinary piece, Tradition II, is a collaboration between well-known artist and Toronto native Howard Fox and Susan Gold who penned the calligraphy. The design pays homage to the work of Marc Chagall, who depicted the Jewish world in a palette drenched with color. The ketubah depicts a wedding couple embracing, sharing in their mutual joy, accompanied by a single violin.

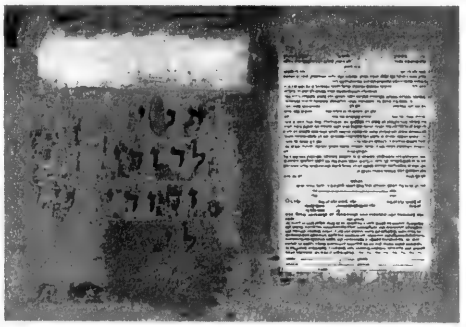
THE KETUBAH: A TRADITION REVIVED

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

In legal and religious terms, says Michael Shapiro of Ketubah Ketubah, a ketubah is a written marriage contract that has been part of Jewish tradition since at least Babylonian times. But it can also be a work of art.

While there are some extant medieval examples, most date from the last few hundred years. Until 20 or 25 years ago, the art of the ketubah had declined.

"My grandparents," Shapiro recalls, "didn't have an artistic ketubah. But now the artistic, even handwritten document is coming back." So is the illumination and ornament which once was so much a part of the tradition.



These ketubot are by Stephanie Adler.

As befits a marriage agreement, images from the Song of Songs are popular. However, there are no set requirements or limitations on style, beyond those of decorum. There are motifs, designs and images for every taste, ranging from Chagall to Klimt, from the Middle Ages to Art Deco.

Shapiro admits that not every ketubah from the time of hand-written manuscripts was a work of art. Indeed, some were nearly illegible. But while printing brought easier reading, it also took away from individuality and artistic expression.

Ketubah Ketubah is playing a role in reviving the art form. The company offers about 200 different designs, into which the artists have put a great deal of love and care.

Most of what the company sells is original and hand-designed. Usually, the artist produces an edition of a certain number of copies. Silkscreen and lithograph are common media and a few ketubot are made entirely by hand.

Giclee printing, a product of computer technology, keeps the legibility of print, while making the document look individually crafted, not like a form with blanks to fill in. Once the names are written in, text is lined up evenly, so that there are no extra-wide gaps or passages with cramped letters.

As to the text itself, rabbis have strong preferences, so before you choose your text, Shapiro urges you to ascertain what your rabbi wants.

The traditional Orthodox ketubah goes back centuries – some say to Talmudic times, about 200 CE. It was designed to provide for the woman in the event of marital breakdown, in an era when women were not considered equal, and had fewer rights than men.

This text speaks of a certain number of silver pieces. While a student of economics and archeology could translate this amount into today's money, what really counts is the principle of providing for the woman.

The Conservative text is almost identical to the Orthodox one, but adds what is called the Lieberman clause. A safeguard against a woman becoming an agunah, it stipulates that should the marriage break down, the man must give the woman a get. Some Orthodox rabbis, instead of altering the traditional text, make the same stipulation in a side agreement.

The Reform text is egalitarian: the man and the woman make identical commitments to one another. Canadian Reform rabbis have a standard version that includes a clause to address the issue of agunot. Ketubah Ketubah has a wide range of designs with this text.

Both the Orthodox and Conservative ketubot are in Aramaic, with some Hebrew. The Reform text is in modern Hebrew.

While Ketubah Ketubah is a Canadian company, it is also known throughout the United States. You can call 416-963-9191 to schedule an appointment, but to help make your selection, look first at the company's Web site at www.ketubah.com.

Also, if you live in Toronto, you can visit and look at samples. For a in-stock design that can be customized to your needs, come at least two to three months ahead. But if you want a totally handwritten ketubah, come earlier, Shapiro says.

'Relive the party through the video'

By ADAM GRACHNIK
CJN Intern

The spirit of a great party should last a lifetime. Yet, as we get older, the aura definitely begins to fade and the images become a little foggy. Thankfully, a good videographer can create a video that ensures you will always recall those special simchahs.

Brian Korson of Video Excellence (905-731-4355) and Richard Saunders of Redstone Pictures (416-256-4666) know all about capturing the essence of a party.

"You can relive the party through the video," says Korson, who started Video Excellence 19 years ago.

Saunders also believes in the power of video.

"The video can take people back to that special time. It's a once-in-a-lifetime thing," he says. "It keeps the function alive."

Saunders says he often hears stories of grandparents bringing their videos to Florida with them. This helps the families stay together and remind them of happy times, he explains.

However, it takes a good videographer to capture the true feeling of a party and Saunders explains what it takes to be at the top of his trade.

"You need to be heads-up and attentive. You must anticipate things," he says. "You should have years of experience and have been in a lot of different situations."

Both videographers try hard to not interfere with the party by remaining on the periphery.

"We are unobtrusive and dress all in black so don't draw attention to ourselves," says Korson.

Saunders says the greatest compliment is being called by the client the day after a party to ask whether he got everything, because the client didn't see him all night.

"We are flies on the wall and don't want to add anything to the party," says Saunders, who has been in business more than 10 years. "We are there to record and try really hard not to enhance anything."

Having each shot hundreds of simchahs, both Korson and Saunders have seen some amazing things.

Korson chuckles when recounting the tale of filming a hoiah in which a woman's skirt wasn't properly fastened, and of filming a bride and groom dancing on a table when it buckled under their feet. He also boasts of filming an Orthodox affair with more than 850 people.

Saunders recalls the heroic role he and his crew once played.

"The place lost the power grid and there was no back up," he says. "We ended up lighting the party with our battery belts, we escorted people to the bathroom [and] provided a spotlight so people could speak. The video guy became the big hero."

Saunders also marvels at one party where 720 people crammed into a room that had the capacity for 400. "It was huge and outrageous," he says.

Screaming for ice cream

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

There's nothing like a grand entrance at a simchah, especially when you're the guest of honour. You can come by limousine or scooter or, if you like something different, by… ice cream cart.

Rolling Cones Ice Cream Corp. offers a variety of unique party ideas for all age groups. The company provides tricycle-style ice cream carts for family functions and corporate events, which can be incorporated into the party for some extra pizzazz, says Brian Barish, president of Rolling Cones (416-663-0999, ext. 230).

In one scenario, Barish says, "A groom peddles his bike out of the kitchen with the bride into the middle of the dance floor and serves ice cream to all their guests."

The ice cream carts are also popular at bar and bat mitzvahs; the boy or girl will drive the tricycle and distribute ice cream novelties to his or her friends, Barish adds.

"At the bar mitzvahs, the kids go wild for the ice cream carts, especially if the boy comes out riding the bike.

"[They] add a touch of originality and fun. No matter what age you are, every one likes ice cream. It's a treat that makes everyone feel good."

And Barish, who grew up in the ice cream industry, should know. His parents owned Dickie Dee and Richard Ds until 1992.

He stayed involved in the ice cream business, selling the equipment, and three years ago, he expanded into street vending, selling novelty ice cream from Nestlés and Haagen-Dazs.

"I have ice cream trucks and carts, hence the name Rolling Cones. As well, we're a rocking ice cream company."

The trucks sell products in Toronto, Vaughan, Richmond Hill and Markham, but they and the carts can also be leased, says Barish.

"We have nine different types of equipment to fit the occasion, from three-wheeled tricycles to push carts with umbrellas. People do all kinds of themes. The ice cream carts work all the time.

"I was also surprised at how many weddings we did. People are partying. They want to have fun."

And there are plenty of treats to choose from, he says.

"We have a selection of 25 to 35 different ice cream products available. Everything is pre-packaged and easy to serve. There are no health issues and sanitation is guaranteed."

He says he sometimes gets requests from synagogues or party halls, but "usually it's the parent who is creative enough to think of it."

People can also arrange to have the ice cream trucks stop outside their homes for birthday parties or other functions, he says.

There are different packages to choose from with or without delivery; the basic package starts at $100 plus the cost of the ice cream.

Adding an original element helps to differentiate one party from another, says Barish.

"Once in a while, someone does something you remember and it gives the party a memorable touch. A Rolling Cone ice cream will do that for you."

Metropolitan Ice Cream (416-245-1335) also has ice cream carts with umbrellas available for rental, says Beverley Golden, marketing director for the company.

People can choose to dish out scoops of ice cream or they can opt for novelty items like sundae cups.

"We do both pareve and dairy ice cream," Golden says. "Fruit sorbets are also enormously popular."

Metropolitan Ice cream, which is classified in the industry as a super premium or gourmet ice cream, offers a huge selection of products.

"We have 150 different flavours," Golden says. "If we're doing strawberries and cream, it's top quality strawberries and cream. We do four or five different types of chocolate. The cater can order our Lindt milk chocolate. We also do a dark chocolate. What you see in retail stores is [just] a small portion of what we offer."

Golden explains that the company works closely with caterers offering a huge range of unique flavours.

"We've even created unusual flavours like sour cream ice cream. There's a lot of champagne. There are many things available for an event. I usually deal with a party planner or caterer."

And all products are kosher. "We're a totally kosher plant," Golden says, adding that the ice cream is extremely high quality.

"All our ice creams are low fat. We're 10 per cent fat. We also use all natural products. There are no artificial colours, flavours or stabilizers. We're known for our vanilla ice cream. We use pure vanilla… We're going for the palate that likes a pure flavour."

Milk, cream and sugar are the main ingredients of ice cream, she explains.

"You need the sugar for texture, not for sweetness. We believe you can't get the creamy texture without sugar, especially for the sorbets…

"People compare ice cream by price, but don't check what's in the cheaper products. There's a lot of air and chemicals. We really do care about what we're putting out. We care about the consumer. We're putting out a high quality dessert."

Sorbet, a fruit in a frozen form, is extremely popular with kosher caterers and comes in many flavours including tropical fruits, says Golden.

"We're using real fruit – real strawberries, raspberries and mango. When you eat our fruit sorbets, you're literally eating real fruit. The raspberry and strawberry is really intense. We do a lovely orange."

The company also has a chocolate orange sorbet called chocolate sunset that is extremely popular, she adds.

Also available are pareve ice creams and a new product, a soy-based gelato which comes in French vanilla, cappuccino, mocha, strawberry and chocolate.

There are various options for a simchah, ranging from fruit sorbets and pareve ice cream desserts to sundae bars with lots of toppings, she says, explaining that she can help the caterers plan a sundae bar.

Golden recommends that people order half the amount of ice cream rather than over-order because not everybody will eat dessert.

She also suggests that people consider serving fruit sorbets in between courses as a palate cleanser.

"This is very popular in a lot of finer hotels and restaurants, especially if you're doing a seven or eight course meal," Golden says. "It's great to refresh your palate. Traditionally, you use a citrus – a lemon, or great fruit or pink grapefruit mint."

Offering unusually flavoured sorbets at the sweet table is another one of her suggestions.

"We do a great lemon champagne. There's a lot of good kosher champagnes. It just depends on where your imagination wants to go."

With parties constantly changing and people's demands increasing, firms need to keep up with party trends and changes in technology.

Saunders says it's now popular at simchahs for people to show pre-made videos, such as a montage of a bar mitzvah boy's baby pictures, before speeches or candlelighting ceremonies.

"[This trend is] really effects-driven and now represents 30 per cent of our business."

Saunders says the biggest recent change in the industry is the introduction of the digital camera, while Korson cites the DVD as another major innovation.

"There have been four to five major technology changes in my 19 years," Korson says. "The big difference now is between VHS and DVD. Even though [many] people don't have DVD machines, they still want the video on DVD. We can do that."

Brian Korson of Video Excellence.

Competition in the industry is fierce, so both companies like to offer something special to their clients.

"We offer a written guarantee to our clients that most of our competition doesn't," says Korson. "We are customer-service oriented and we always stay in tune with what is fresh and needed."

'We offer a written guarantee'

Saunders says it's his staff that make his company special.

"Our people are seasoned vets. They work for us full time. It is the only job they do," he says, emphasizing that his people are not freelancers or part-time. "The clients feel comfortable seeing the same face all the time."

With many options in an industry that has grown incredibly over the years, Saunders cautions that "you get what you pay for."

He says that some less-reputable companies won't finish jobs, or they will run out of batteries or lighting during a shoot. "There is a huge price scale and people who 'cheap-out' are [sometimes] sorry in the end."

Both Korson and Saunders advise clients to do their homework when shopping around for a videographer, because this person will create your own personal piece of history.

Lofranco has just two rules when it comes to pleasing clients: "Service is imperative. The client has to feel like they're number 1. Rule number 2: Read number 1."

His complete spa offers a number of services including customized facials, massages, waxing, updos, haircuts and colouring, manicures, pedicures and makeup application.

Jeunesse has been helping brides, bridal parties and other clients look and feel their best since opening in February of 2001.

Packages are available at very reasonable prices. One package, which includes a facial, half-hour massage, manicure and hairstyle, costs $99.

Makeup by Mandy is another terrific choice (416-633-4040). A one-woman company, Mandy Primack takes extra care when working with clients. She offers makeup application for brides, bridal parties and other clients as well as updos, skin assessments and basic manicures.

Jeunesse Hair and Spa (top and above) offers many services.

"My main philosophy centres on making clients feel the best they can be, whether they're going to a bar mitzvah, a graduation or an awards ceremony," says Primack, who can pack up her multitude of products and go to her clients to apply her talents.

"I always like to do trials for bridal work. I ask them a lot of questions about their personality, the theme of the wedding, the colour of the flowers. They bring in pictures of makeup they like and we work together to create a look," she says.

"It's a collaborative effort."

She says she's interested in creating "that timeless" look and making sure brides are happy and comfortable with they way they look on their wedding day.

"It's not about creating the look they saw on models in the latest fashion magazine. It may not suit them."

Prices are very reasonable. Makeup trials cost between $40 and $45 while makeup applications the day of are $30 to $35. For bridal parties, it's an extra $20 to $30 per person while updos start at $20.

It's best to book in advance, especially for weddings.

"I like to do trials three to four weeks prior to the wedding in case they have questions or want to try a new look."

She even makes herself available to accommodate clients who book at the last minute.

Miki Klevan believes in the Freedom of Sound

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to the CJN

If you're looking for a complete entertainment package for your function or simchah, check out FOS Entertainment Group (905-760-0040).

FOS stands for Freedom of Sound, the DJ division that's been around since 1996. Miki Klevan, owner of the company, started out with two DJs six years ago. Today, the company has 40 DJs and MCs and 30 dancers.

Before he went into the DJ business, Klevan, 24, ran the Diamond Club, a dance club for preteens.

"The kids started requesting us for bar mitzvahs," he says. "We closed the club in 1999 and started focusing on Freedom of Sound as an entertainment company and it evolved from there. The clients were there. The demand was there. The concept proved to be very successful."

The company's basic DJ package, which includes two people – one DJ and one DJ assistant, a complete sound system and complete music library, starts at $600, he says.

"We give the clients a great service at a great price."

During the party, the DJ gives away 10 Freedom of Sound T shirts from Nike, the company sponsor, he says.

"Nike was looking to align itself with an entertainment company and we were looking for a clothing sponsor. It's a marriage that works. They give us products like Nike hats and T- shirts. [We've done] a lot of events for Nike."

In addition to being the company's owner, Klevan also performs. "Being a DJ for me started out as hobby and turned out to be my current occupation," he says. "I can't imagine doing any other thing."

Maybe the Leafs could have used Miki Klevan in Game 6.

Freedom of Sound supports a variety of fund-raising organizations and does an annual summer camp tour.

Freedom of Sound also offers other live entertainment services, including magicians, illusionists, live bands, celebrity look-alikes, fire-breathers and "human statues."

"We produce events for our clients," Klevan says. "We can take care of all their entertainment needs."

The company's headquarters are located in a 5,000-square-foot warehouse/office at Dufferin Street and Steeles Avenue that stores its music and lighting equipment, inflatable and other amusement games and fun food machines.

"Part of our warehouse is set up as a showroom where people can see the lighting, sound systems and demo videos of DJs," Klevan adds.

For special effects, the company has a variety of laser lighting systems to choose from, which can be added to the DJ package, as can effects such as fireworks, dry ice, smoke machines and streamer shots.

"We shoot streamer shot guns during the horah," Klevan says. "We lift the bar or bat mitzvah onto the chair and the streamers come down on everybody. It looks pretty cool."

Freedom of Sound also has audio visual equipment that includes projectors and screens for presentations.

"It's common at bar and bat mitzvahs to show a five-minute presentation of the young person," Klevan says. "At weddings, they sometimes show how the bride and groom met."

In 2001, Freedom of Sound started a games and amusement division that includes a bungee run, sumo wrestling, children's bouncers, inflatable mazes, as well as carnival and casino games.

"The live entertainment department has professional casino dealers on staff who come dressed in tuxedoes," says Klevan.

The company also carries inflatable sky dancers, 15-foot puppets that look like they're dancing to the music, he says.

"They really add to the decor. They can be matched to different themes."

Freedom of Sound's fun foods department stocks candy floss as well as snow cone, popcorn, doughnut-making, hot dog and Hawaiian shaved ice machines. All the food machines are kosher.

Venues for when home or a social hall doesn't cut it

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Not all children feel comfortable dancing at a bar or bat mitzvah. The girls are usually ready and willing, but the boys... well they often lack the maturity or the confidence to ask the girls to dance. One solution to this dilemma, is to hold the simchah at a venue that offers activities to complement the dancing.

A popular choice is Dave and Buster's (905-760-7600), a 65,000 square-foot entertainment complex located at the northeast corner of highways 400 and 7 in Vaughan. The building, which holds 2500 people, offers all kinds of activities for the young, and the young at heart.

"There's nothing like Dave and Buster's in Canada," says Michael Mandel, the Canadian licensee for the Dallas-based entertainment chain. "People walk in and they're amazed by the whole facility. They walk around for 20 minutes exploring the place before they do anything."

He describes Dave and Buster's as an "upscale" setting. "There's stained glass and a lot of brass and mahogany finishes. Our stained glasses is made by fourth generation members of the Tiffany family. Every piece is unique."

The complex boasts a 35,000 square-foot midway with the most current and high-tech video games, including a driving range, hockey simulators, sports video games, a shooting gallery and basketball. There's even a '50s style diner. For a bar or bat mitzvah, the host gives the guests a power card to play the games and can arrange for a pre-determined amount for each card.

"We do organized events for a bar or bat mitzvah that revolve around competition on the games. Prizes can be awarded," says Mandel. "Anybody who plays on the midway gets tickets they can trade in for prizes. The prizes range from plastic frisbees to televisions and signed sports memorabilia. There are more than 400 different items."

Many games and activities appeal to people ages 22 to 35, he notes. "We're often called the Chuckie Cheese for adults."

The complex houses a large upscale casually elegant restaurant and three bars, including a sports bar with 20 televisions, and there are a variety of rooms for private parties.

Dave and Buster's is ideal if you want a party venue that will "wow" your guests, says Mandel. "It's a popular place for bar mitzvahs. We can conform to any service...

"We're very flexible and very affordable. We can customize any menu. We can bring in kosher food. All the food is prepared fresh the day of your event."

He says the most popular room for bar and bat mitzvahs and other private functions is the Showroom, a two- tiered room that can hold up to 300 people. "You can set up a dance floor to accommodate a DJ or band. It also has self- contained washrooms and a hand-carved bar with stained glass."

There are also custom-built mahogany billiard tables scattered throughout the complex, including some located adjacent to the Showroom, which is also the venue for in-house murder mystery dinners, when the room is not being used for private functions.

A luxury customized bus is also available to transport the people to and from a party. "It's big for corporate events. It's a convenience we offer."

There is even transportation service from the parking lot to the building. A 10-seat golf cart picks people up and later delivers them back to their cars.

But leaving isn't always easy, says Mandel. "The little kids cry when they leave. They don't want to go. They're having so much fun. The adults don't want to leave either. I often hear the adults say, 'It's fun to be a kid again.'"

For kids' parties on a smaller scale, parents may want to consider Rainbow Cinemas (905-886-7464) at the Promenade Mall in Thornhill, on Bathurst Street, just south of Highway 7. The party package is $8.25 per child, which includes a movie, popcorn, a small drink, candy and a small loot bag.

The movies are all first-run, says Gulshan Singh, marketing manager for Rainbow cinemas in Ontario. "We offer a unique concept that makes movie- going very affordable for families. Our locations are beautiful, posh and updated with Dolby sound."

He says Rainbow Cinemas, which will also be opening locations at Fairview and Woodbine malls this summer, has very affordable prices for both parties and regular shows. "Our admission price is $7.50 for adults and $4.25 for kids, and for matinees it's $4.25 for everyone."

The matinee price applies to holidays and weekends, Singh adds. The mall location is very convenient, Singh says. "People can do their shopping and then end the evening off with a movie." (Pictures by Dave and Buster's)

Making a big production out of a marriage proposal

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

A few decades back, someone who hired a skywriter to write "will you marry me?" was guaranteed his proverbial 15 minutes of fame, and a stunt like this would still turn a few heads toward the heavens.

But to Louisa Jaslow and Jonah Stroh, skywritten proposals are old hat.

Jaslow and Stroh are the co-producers and co-directors of Will You Marry Me?, a TV show produced by Docutainment Plus Productions' (416-537-5004; marryme@microtainment.com; www. marrymetv.ca) about the extraordinary lengths some people will go to in order to make a marriage proposal.

In one episode, a man named Darryl and his girlfriend Pauline visit the zoo. Darryl is carrying T-shirts printed with the message "Pauline, will you marry me?" but bundled up so Pauline can't read them.

He takes her to the cage housing a family of orangutans, tosses the T-shirts in, and hopes the orangutans will put them on, showing Pauline his proposal.

She and Darryl had just had a baby, so Darryl told her he was appearing in a (fictitious) show called New Fathers that planned to make a humorous comparison between a human and orangutan family.

Wasn't Pauline liable to wonder why T-shirts were being thrown to the apes? Yes, but there was a plausible explanation for this too.

In fact, the keeper often works with students of animal behaviour who are very interested in orangutans. They are known to be intelligent – so much so, that normal zoo routines bore them. Cognitive experiments not only help science, they also liven up life for the primates.

Pauline thought she was witnessing one of these "mental enrichment exercises," as they're called. She was asked to guess which orangutan would be first to put on a T-shirt; she guessed that it would be the mother.

Well, was it? And what happened with Darryl's proposal? Jaslow and Stroh aren't telling.

"You'll have to watch the show," is all they will say.

The special aired June 4 on the Life Network, but it will be repeated; as well, six more episodes will air in January.

Jaslow and Stroh say it's still usually the man who pops the question. In an era when male roles are undergoing continual re-evaluation, an out-of-the-ordinary proposal seems to be a way for a man to show his mettle. Yet Jaslow and Stroh say they look forward to having many women on their show.

Docutainment's other productions include The Zoo Diaries, which goes behind the scenes at the Toronto Zoo to tell the stories of the men and women who work with more than 5,000 animals, starting its fourth season July 3 on the Life Network; Glenn Gould: the Russian Journey, about the pianist's famous 1957 tour, airing this fall on CBC Opening Night; and Military Machines, to air on the Discovery Channel on a date to be determined.

Look for someone with a competitive advantage, both entertainers advise – someone who offers unique services. With Magen Boys, that means having two DJs at every event: one to play the music and one out on the dance floor, interacting with the guests. With Bouaziz's Starr Productions, that means having male as well as female dancers. In the past, with notable exceptions like Fred Astaire, most dancers in popular entertainment have been female, but if men enjoy watching a woman dance, why shouldn't women enjoy watching men?

For better quality entertainment, Magen recommends choosing a smaller company that will give you more personal, hands-on attention. Success in his field, he says, isn't a matter of turnover: it's better to do fewer parties, and have the guests enjoy themselves at every one. He says he has never heard people talk about an entertainer who's just OK: party guests only remember those who are especially good or bad. So for him, the only way to be remembered is to be especially good.

Cruises a popular form of travel

By ADAM GRACHNIK

Whether it's a bar mitzvah or a honeymoon, travelling to a faraway place will make any simchah memorable and rewarding.

Stanley Lupka from Manor Travel (905-669-1347) and Emile Aufgang from Aufgang Travel (416-789-7117) echo this belief and strongly encourage all people to consider travelling when planning their next simchah. They point to their own experiences to illustrate their point.

"I love finding some faraway small place," says Aufgang, who has visited Israel 60 times and boasts about the small corners of the world he has seen. "You really can't conceive a place until you have been there."

Lupka simply likes seeing new things.

"I have been doing this for 21 years," he says of the business that has allowed him to lead 30 group trips to Washington, several to Israel and more recently to the Catskill mountains. "I love it; you always get to seen new things."

According to Lupka, the first thing travellers should think about is how much they want to spend, since that will narrow down the options of where they can go. Aufgang, who also stresses the importance of setting a budget, claims that travel is very subjective.

"Some people like the busyness of New York City," he says. "While others like deserted sand dunes."

Either way, Lupka and Aufgang both agree that cruises are currently the most popular form of travel. Yet they point to different areas of the world where tourists are beginning to cruise.

"Alaskan cruises are getting more popular," says Lupka. "Some people like to try something new or like what they have seen in the past."

Aufgang says that many of his clients choose to go on cruises in the Mediterranean Sea. But one couple, he said, just returned from a cruise on the Norwegian coast.

While traditionally people go to Israel when celebrating their simchahs abroad, some families are starting to explore other areas of the world.

"I have started to do a few bar mitzvahs in eastern Europe," Aufgang says. "People are going to places of old Jewish heritage with refurbished synagogues."

Part of the process of travelling is finding an agent that you can trust. Aufgang says for his company this comes down to their experience.

"We have been doing this for years and have firsthand travel experience," he says of his staff who have a minimum of 12-15 years' experience. "We pay attention to detail."

For Lupka, he said that his staff speaks many different languages, which allows them to cater to many different people.

"We are specific and all [the agents in the office] specialize in different things," he says.

Lupka and Aufgang are both proud of what they do and truly enjoy being able to deal with people on a personal level.

"I love the action between myself and people. I love talking to people and speaking to them in their language," says Lupka.

Aufgang says he feels rewarded each time someone returns from a trip and tells him how good it was.

So whether it's a Norwegian cruise or a bat mitzvah celebration in Budapest, start saving your dollars because there is an entire world to discover.

Abstract artist tailors work to specific event

By ERIN SILVER
Special to The CJN

Looking for a unique and personal gift for a newly married couple, a graduate or a bar mitzvah boy? Try to express yourself in abstract terms, or at least commission an expert to do it for you.

That's what abstract expressionist artist Jonathan Hiltz (905-881-5270) has been doing for an ever-increasing, ever-enthusiastic number of patrons for the past three years.

"People call me up and ask me to paint something for a certain event or a special person," says Hiltz, 27, and an owner of Hiltz Squared Media Group Inc., an entertainment conglomerate based in Canada.

"I ask them to tell me about the person or the couple, and from that I try to capture their essence on canvas," he says. "I take aspects of the people and create dreamlike visions, shapes and free-flowing images."

He says his art is more about painting visions than it is about solid objects, such as a bowl of fruit on a table.

Across the bottom of each piece he paints a black strip and on it he writes a personal message from the commissioner to the receiver.

"It's like a greeting card, but a lot more personal," he says. "The art is tailored to a specific event and the commissioner is saying something from their heart."

Recently, he says, a patron requested a painting for his son, who was graduating from university and moving into his own apartment.

"He wanted a gigantic painting and he wanted to say something dealing with motivation and achievement, so at the bottom of the painting I wrote, 'Success is the only result of determination,' and he loved it!"

Across the bottom of a painting tailored to a bride and groom, he inscribed the words, "Love is eternal." Another painting commissioned by a husband for his wife, reads, "Right now, I'm thinking of you."

"This is something that hasn't really been done before," says Hiltz. "Traditionally, artists paint something they like and sell it to people who like what they've done. I'm turning that notion on its head. I tailor paintings to you. I only know one other artist who does that."

Another unique aspect of Hiltz's artwork is the incorporation of words into the painting, something he says nobody else does. As a result, his paintings make for memorable gifts.

"It's the type of gift most people wouldn't expect to get," he says.

The trend Hiltz started is catching on, and he says his work "is becoming fantastically popular."

He's currently working on nine canvases at once and he says he does at least 120 pieces a year. Using acrylic and pastel on canvases as large as eight by five feet to ones that fit in a frame on a desk, Hiltz has designed a range of pieces. He's created everything from album covers to works of art to commemorate the openings of restaurants and nightclubs to weddings and birthdays.

Prices range from about $800 to $5,000, depending on the size of the work and also on where it's being shipped. (He's created pieces that have been sent to commissioners in countries such as Italy, Portugal and the United States.)

He says he usually requires about two weeks' notice from commissioners, but he can arrange to make masterpieces on tighter deadlines as well.

The hardest aspect of being a part-time artist, he says, is not so much managing his time or deciding how best to capture the essence of a person, but parting with his creations.

"Sometimes it's hard to have to hand over my work to commissioners because I'd love to hang it on my wall, but I give it to them with a smile, knowing it's going to hang on theirs."

Where is the most unusual location you've shot at?

"If it can be written or drawn with a single-stroke pen, it can usually be made in neon," Northcott says.

Bending Machine created one memorable group of pieces for a party at the Sephardic Kehilla Centre. A column of flowers was set on each of 23 tables; above each column was a neon sculpture in pink and purple. When the lights were dimmed, the room was suffused with a pink and purple glow.

Artistic Creations specializes in middle- to higher-end theme-related decor, working in various materials. Rather than create a single piece as part of a decor scheme, Heisel likes to design an entire room.

Artistic Creations specializes in middle- to higher-end theme-related decor

With her background in art and graphic design, Heisel uses her talents to generate new ideas. Her artistic experience has helped give her a sense of style, and of what is suitable for each event.

Heisel doesn't always plan themes, although they take up 90 per cent of her commissions. She's done a lot of sports and recently, some work with Hawaiian motifs. She also makes themed place cards (for example, in the form of hockey pucks) and centrepieces.

"My work never gets boring," she says. As every function is unique, she treats each job as a new challenge and encourages clients to be creative.

Among the things Heisel also creates are memory books, guest books whose pages you sign at an event. Pages without signatures are used for keepsakes such as cards and photos. Heisel scans them for her portfolio so the client gets the originals back.

Most artists are versatile and learn to work in more than one genre or medium, but usually each has a specialty they enjoy most.

Heisel's forte is cartoons. She does not, however, create caricatures. Cartoons don't have to remind you of a real person, she says, and being less personal, they're less likely to offend.

Heisel likes to work with kids. They often know exactly what they want, she says, but they're spontaneous and fun. She volunteers with kids as well.

One of Artistic Creations' products is Curing Kisses, a lip gloss that can be personalized with a phrase such as "Shana's Bat Mitzvah." A percentage of the profits goes to your choice of charity, Heisel says.

After 10 years in business, most of Heisel's work comes from referrals. Even so, she attends one trade show a year to network with other professionals and scout out new ideas. She refers her clients to others in the business who create items that she doesn't.

Book her services as far ahead as possible, Heisel advises. Six months ahead is great; more is even better.

Modern music edges out Mendelssohn during ceremonies

By SUZANNE WEISS
Jewish Bulletin of Northern California

Four centuries ago, Shakespeare wrote, "If music be the food of love, play on." And all this time, the music has been playing and lovers have been listening.

Tradition tends to govern the choices Jewish couples make in music for their wedding ceremonies. A number of experts agree that the old Wagner and Mendelssohn wedding marches are out and Israeli music is in, but opinions are mixed about Sunrise, Sunset from Fiddler on the Roof.

"The music from Fiddler is very popular," maintains Cantor Henry Greenberg of Congregation Beth Israel-Judea in San Francisco. "The classical stuff, like Mendelssohn, a little less."

Greenberg's been performing weddings in the synagogue for more than 25 years. "Some of the couples want more modern, contemporary 'love' music rather than Jewish music," he continued, "but we try to encourage the Israeli music. It's really up to the rabbi. What makes the bride and groom happy is the first consideration. Russian Jews enjoy having the music of their own background, and that's OK with me."

Erev Shel Shoshanim, Dodi Li and, for the recessional Siman Tov, Mazel Tov, were pretty universal among others who were asked, as well as selections from the Song of Songs. They are, in fact, the undisputed selections of Cantor Roslyn Barak of San Francisco's Congregation Emanu-El.

"I tend to sing liturgy," Barak said, "the wedding blessing, the Sheva Brachot. If I do a song, it's from Song of Songs. I like to stay traditional. But actually, I don't get a lot of requests. [The bride and groom] may want more from the organist. I think I sang Sunrise, Sunset once."

That's one time more than composer Stephen Richards has sung it lately. "Years ago we got a lot of requests for music from Fiddler, but that's kind of gone by the wayside now," says Richards, cantor emeritus at Congregation B'nai Tikvah in Walnut Creek.

He says he tries to guide couples toward appropriate wedding music. "Sometimes couples come with their music pre-selected and, if I don't like it, I'll let them know."

In addition to the selections already mentioned, he noted that the Pachelbel Canon in D is frequently used as a processional. He also likes the music of contemporary composer Michael Isaacson, one of whose songs was played at his own wedding in 1958, along with Richards' own arrangements of Israeli music.

Jerry Derblich, owner of Afikomen in Berkeley and its adjacent Wedding Store, hasn't seen a change in taste in the 10 years he has been in business. And he's prepared to help couples who are not having a cantor.

"People come in, they have a band that doesn't play much Jewish music and they ask us for sheet music," he said. For that purpose, he stocks Mazel Tov: Music for Jewish Weddings (Tara Publications), a book that contains music for three different types of ceremonies. A CD and cassette also are available.

Isaacson also has a CD called Kol Simcha: Jewish Wedding Music. And, finally, The Real Complete Jewish Wedding & Party, a two disc collection from Worldwide Success Records has 50 songs performed by David and the High Spirit that will take a couple down the aisle, through the ceremony, dinner, party and out the door into a new life.

"We have professional staff that run the machines," says Klevan. "They're treats. We bring them out the last two hours of the event. We set up an area for [them]. The kids don't really enjoy the sweet table that much. They don't eat the fruit."

For outdoor events, the company stocks power generators, inflatable slides and obstacle courses.

Last November, Freedom of Sound introduced a trade show division that features different vendors such as caterers, decorators, videographers, photographers and florists.

"The vendors get a chance to showcase what they have," says Klevan, noting that the next show will be held on Nov. 19 at the Paradise Banquet and Convention Centre at Jane and Highway 7.

He stresses that the company is always on the lookout for new items.

"We are constantly searching the global entertainment industry to find new and innovative products and services to bring to Toronto," he says.

"Today, Freedom of Sound is able to bring all these aspects under one umbrella. We provide competitive prices, unbeatable quality and outstanding service. We are truly regarded as Ontario's one stop entertainment shop."

A lively party with Times Square

BY BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Rick Levine's love of music dates back to his teen years. By the time he was in his twenties, he was singing and playing guitar at all kinds of simchahs.

"It was wonderful to get paid for something I loved to do," Levine says today.

In 1980, he formed his own band, the Rick Levine Band, and in 1994, he parlayed his experience into an entertainment company, Times Square Entertainment (905-881-6400).

Times Square offers its clients access to top-quality entertainment services, including DJs, dancers, live bands and MCs as well as access to event-planning expertise. In fact, Times Square has developed a referral service and event planning Web site – www.torontopartyguide.com – to help people plan their events.

Levine co-produces event-planning shows with wedding planner Lynn Cohen, to showcase bands, DJs, caterers, florists, photographers videographers and decorators. One show takes place in the fall at Beth Tikvah Synagogue and the other is held in the winter at the Inn on the Park.

Rick Levine with planner Lynn Cohen.

"These shows are a great start for someone who's planning a simchah," says Levine.

Times Square Entertainment was established, he says, because over the years, he became knowledgeable about community functions.

"We have been serving the community for over 20 years, so we can also offer event planning services based on our wealth of knowledge and experience," Levine says.

"When someone hires the Rick Levine Band or a Times Square Entertainment DJ, we provide them with event planning services free of charge."

The key to a successful function is good organization, he says.

"You have to know when to play the right music, when to pick up the party with the dancing or to play quietly when they're [eating] dinner. With our experience, we can foresee a lot of the concerns people might have when they're planning a function."

As for the music, there are several options.

"We've developed a high-quality interactive DJ service where we offer a variety of entertainment packages to suit every occasion," says Levine.

"Some of our DJs are professional singers and entertainers, so they can sing live to backtracks, giving a new dimension to the entertainment music throughout the evening. That's very unique in the industry."

Times Square also has live band and DJ combinations and continuous music packages.

Promotional DVD that showcases a live event for perspective clients

The company takes great care to help the clients choose the right music, says Levine.

"We invite our clients to supply us with a list of songs. We have the bar or bat mitzvah child e-mail a list of songs. We e-mail them a list of songs as well.

"We have virtually any song that people would want. We work from the list that the clients provide. We also take on spot requests. If anybody has a particular song they want us to play at a function, we can play it...

"We arrange the songs in advance with the clients. We suggest songs. We can work with any song that they would like to have."

Times Square also has a lot of expertise when planning candle-lighting. And dancers boost the party spirit and lighting packages "add to the ambience and excitement of the evening," says Levine. "We also have access to a DJ booth which is unique to our company. You don't see the equipment and wires. It gives a more finished and professional look to the stage area."

Clients can count on Times Square for a lively party, he says.

"We have contests and games and all the latest music that the kids want to hear and we have great renditions of the horahs and ethnic music that's required at a bar or bat mitzvah.

"We offer versatile entertainment. We can reach all the age groups. We're able to please the adults and the kids. Our DJs play the right music at the right time and they don't take too many breaks."

Times Square has a promotional DVD that showcases a live event for perspective clients.

"We can pull together a unique and fantastic evening based on my experience and the resources I have available," Levine says. "I invite people to call me or talk to me in person at the next party show, which will be held at Beth Tikvah on Oct. 2."

Invitations set the tone

By ADAM GRACHNIK
CJN Intern

A party's first impression is created by one very powerful piece of paper. It comes in many shapes, sizes, colours and textures and has the ability to excite people or completely turn them off. Worried? Don't be, it's only an invitation.

Gail Shapiro of Paper Expressions (905-764-7784) and Gilda Lefton of Stationery Plus (905-881-5588) understand the impact an invitation can have and the commitment that goes into making a special one.

"The invitation sets the tone for the party. It gets your guest there and starts the mood," says Shapiro.

Lefton adds that "it's the first glimpse of an affair. People get most mileage in this one item, because guests see this everyday."

Both agree that there are no rules for a good invitation, since it is a personal matter.

"You are never going to please everyone," says Lefton. "Choose a kind of invitation that you like."

Adds Shapiro: "A good invitation is all personal taste. Some people write a poem, while others are more religious so they have more Hebrew or put on a Star of David."

The industry is always changing, with new printing technologies and printing styles being introduced each year.

Shapiro says people are starting to use more flowers, ribbons and, in some cases, even rhinestones, to get away from the traditional three-layer paper.

Lefton says that some older traditions, such as embossing – raised words or graphics – are also making a comeback.

A slowly growing trend is the low cost and quick method of inviting people by e-mail, which Shapiro disagrees with.

"I don't agree with e-mail stuff. That's tacky and very impersonal," she says. "A party is a very personal thing and e-mail isn't."

Some people are even choosing to print invitations on their computers at home, but Lefton warns against it.

"With computer printed invitations, what you see is what you get. The ink can smudge. Quality printing gives an added dimension and really perks it up," she explains.

Ultimately making people happy is of utmost importance for both Shapiro and Lefton.

"I like seeing people happy," says Shapiro. "I love it. I meet all kinds of people and I am doing things that are creative."

For Lefton it's the "look of gratification that people have when they get my invitation, this makes me happy and fills me with pride."

Find it on the Internet

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

The more information you have, the harder it is to sort out what you really need to know. If you're planning a celebration, finding out what's new on the party scene may seem like a daunting job. Why not just grab the Yellow Pages, and call the people you know?

On the other hand, you want the best for yourself and your guests. Inventive party professionals are coming up with new ideas every day, and some of the new people won't be in the phone book. Sooner or later, you'll have to do some research.

The old way, with address books, directories and the phone, can eat up many hours. In the same time or less, you can get more information on the Internet, and be more up-to-date.

Karen Garscadden and Karen Jacobs of Up & Coming Events Inc. (905-886-8148; www.upandcoming events.ca), and Lowell Brown of Eventtips.com (416-782-0322; www.eventtips.com), offer Web directories to meet your needs. Each directory has a different approach to how it does so.

A page from Eventtips website.

Up & Coming's Web site introduces you to the company, its services, staff and the many ideas it has for occasions such as weddings, bar/bat mitzvahs and corporate events. At www.upandcomingevents.makesparties.com, you'll find a catalogue of supplies, accessories and novelties.

Up & Coming and Eventtips are free information sources and one-stop shopping for novelties, prizes and ideas to make a party unique. There's more here than in the Yellow Pages, and to get an overview, you don't have to visit a store. It's faster and easier to find what you want clicking on Internet links than by flipping back and forth among catalogues or directories.

"On the information highway," as Garscadden says, "the Web is the fast lane."

The time saved can be spent exploring links that just might be interesting – and chancing upon ideas you otherwise wouldn't have dreamed of.

Up & Coming also has an Internet showroom. Garscadden realizes that even computer-friendly types like to take things in hand, and to touch and feel. The Web doesn't supplant being there in the flesh, but supplements it.

But no matter how high-tech, Garscadden says, we still need to meet and talk with people. An online service allows you to quickly eliminate the people you decide not to use – leaving more time for those you want to work with.

Eventtips' site is organized into four categories: weddings, corporate events, bar or bat mitzvahs and special occasions. From each, you can go to the tips archive and resource directory. The site also offers consulting services. You can click on a button and talk to Brown himself, or e-mail him.

The tips archive is a collection of advice, articles and information on everything from questions to ask your photographer to games and decorations. The resource directory, with categories like caterers and DJs, lists over 900 companies and professionals. This number is only a fraction of the people in the party sector; and because new businesses are opening, diversifying and closing every day, the resource directory is constantly updated and expanded. Eventtips also publishes an e-zine four times yearly, and offers a monthly draw with prizes.

Hard-copy directories like the Yellow Pages are updated yearly; by the time they're printed and delivered, they're partly out of date. On a Web site, it's easier and faster to post new information and delete what's obsolete.

Besides being information dispensers, Up & Coming are event planners, and for what they don't do themselves, they can refer you to someone who does. They can do all your planning or a small part – although in Garscadden's experience, a small part usually expands into something larger.

To help companies promote themselves, Brown is also developing a virtual trade show. Here, you'll be able to talk to companies in detail, and it will provide a variety of services, even including providing a companion for an elderly person at your party.

For some time, it's been possible to find the information you need on the Internet. Up & Coming and Eventtips don't only add more information, they make that information easier to use.

MASSACRE NEAR MEGIDDO: 17 Israelis were killed last week and more than 40 wounded when a Palestinian suicide bomber detonated a car laden with explosives beside an Egged bus near the northern Israeli town of Megiddo. CUPE resolution angers members

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Union locals representing office workers at Toronto-area Jewish agencies are steaming mad at an emergency resolution passed recently at an Ontario regional convention of the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) that they say was introduced at the last minute without opposition and is biased against Israel.

They are also concerned the resolution will be introduced at this week's meeting of the Canadian Labour Congress (CLC) in Vancouver and be given the national labour body's seal of approval.

However, CUPE Ontario President Sid Ryan disputed criticism of the resolution, saying there was nothing wrong with the procedural steps taken to introduce it and that it fairly addresses both sides of the Mideast dispute.

He also downplayed the influence it might have at the CLC convention, saying any final resolution reached by the national body will likely be a composite document that reflects the views of various unions.

The emergency resolution, introduced by Toronto CUPE Council at the CUPE Ontario convention late

The News in Brief

CANADA

Palestinian Charged

TORONTO — A leader in the Palestinian community has been arrested and charged in the March 30 assault on Dr. Bernard Goldman. The prominent surgeon dislocated and broke his shoulder when he was shoved after confronting Palestinian protesters outside Israel's consulate here. Murad Awin Ebied, 37, of Mississauga, was charged with assault causing bodily harm. He will appear in court July 11.

CIC Calls on Ottawa

OTTAWA — In the wake of last week's suicide bombing attack on a bus that killed 17 Israelis, the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) called on the federal government to make it clear to Yasser Arafat and the Palestinian Authority "that Canada will no longer tolerate their refusal to take meaningful actions to end the terrorist campaign against Israel, and that there are severe consequences for failing to do so." The CIC also called on Canada, in its capacity as head of the G-8, to form an international coalition that will condemn "the continued use by the Palestinian leadership of terrorism and anti-Israel incitement as tools of diplomacy."

ISRAEL

Mad Cow Confirmed

JERUSALEM — Results from a Swiss lab have confirmed Israel's first case of mad cow disease. Brain samples from a Golan Heights cow confirmed it was infected. Health officials will implement emergency procedures, which require testing all cattle over the age of 30 months and banning the sale of any meat products that have not been tested.

Crime Down

JERUSALEM — The crime rate in Israel dropped by 1.5 per cent during the first four months of 2002, compared to the same period last year. Car theft dropped 14 per cent, and the number of murders fell from 62 to 53. The number of reported rapes, however, rose by 24 per cent.

New Movement

JERUSALEM — Labour Party dove Yossi Beilin has launched a new Israeli political movement. Its name, Shahar, means dawn in Hebrew and is also an acronym for peace, education and welfare. Addressing supporters in Tel Aviv last week, Beilin stopped short of declaring a new political party. He also criticized Labour's participation in the national unity government, and blasted former prime minister Ehud Barak for what he said was Barak's mishandling of negotiations with the Palestinians.

No TV Porn

JERUSALEM — A Knesset committee has approved for final votes a bill that would forbid TV stations from broadcasting pornography. The committee defeated an alternative bill that would allow restricted access to pornographic programming.

Annan at Babi Yar

KIEV — During a trip to Ukraine last week, United Nations Secretary-General Kofi Annan visited the Holocaust memorial at Babi Yar, where an estimated 100,000 Jews were murdered. Annan said he went to the site "to express my solidarity with the victims of anti-Semitism and intolerance." He also said that attacks on synagogues in Europe in recent months "should trouble people everywhere who are concerned about human rights and human dignity."

Slaughter Blocked

AMSTERDAM — The Dutch agricultural ministry has blocked the kosher slaughter of full-grown bulls, saying the method contravenes laws banning animal abuse. Ruben Vis, head of the Jewish community in the Netherlands, said the government's objection is limited only to bulls, which are so large that kosher slaughtering methods do not always kill the animal right away. The government contends the bulls suffer unduly.

Jews Blamed

MOSCOW — Anti-Semitic leaflets posted in the Ukrainian city of Lvov have blamed Jews for Joseph Stalin's terror famine in the 1930s that killed millions of Ukrainians, according to the Union of Councils for Jews in the Former Soviet Union.

Street Name

BERLIN — A Berlin street named for a Nazi theologian may soon be renamed. The street, Seebergsteig, is named for Reinhold Seeberg, who once called Judaism the "deadly enemy of every true culture." Historians say Seeberg's anti-Semitic sermons aided the Nazi rise to power.

Seinfeld to Israel

NEW YORK — Comedian Jerry Seinfeld is planning a solidarity visit to Israel, where he will give a single performance. No date has been set. Seinfeld is expected to perform in Tel Aviv.

Wasserman Dies

HOLLYWOOD — Lew Wasserman, the last of the great Jewish Hollywood moguls of the 20th century, died June 3 at his home in Beverly Hills. He was 89. A major donor to Jewish causes, Wasserman was credited with changing the talent agency business and building Universal Studios. He oversaw production of such blockbusters as Jaws, E.T. and Jurassic Park.

Israel resolution stirs controversy at OISE

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Some faculty members at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education of the University of Toronto (OISE) are feeling dismayed about a resolution and covering letter condemning Israel that have been making their way around Canadian universities.

The April 29 letter, signed by Sherene Razack, director of the Centre for Integrative Anti-Racism Studies, requests that her colleagues circulate and sign a resolution pertaining to the Middle East.

Razack urges her colleagues to "join us in this initiative by immediately circulating the attached Resolution to your colleagues so that we can make our voices heard..."

The letter notes that "in the context of the current atrocities perpetrated against the Palestinians by the Israeli state and army, we, Canadian scholars meeting at the first national conference on Critical Race Scholarship and the university, find it imperative to stand up and denounce these crimes against humanity..."

The accompanying resolution is addressed to Prime Minister Jean Chrétien, Minister of Foreign Affairs Bill Graham and the chancellors and presidents of Canadian universities. It was issued after a conference on Critical Race Scholarship and the University held at OISE at the end of April.

Among other things, the resolution condemns Israel for its recent invasion of the "occupied territories" and calls for the immediate creation of a Palestinian state and the recognition of the Palestinian refugees' right of return.

After reading the resolution and accompanying letter, OISE educator Avi Hyman wrote a letter to the dean and U of T's race relations committee asking advice on how to deal with the matter.

Because the resolution was circulated with a letter from the Centre of Anti-Racism studies, "there were many of us at OISE who felt uncomfortable with the possibility that people reading the resolution might feel this is an official resolution of the Centre for Integrative Anti-Racism Studies at OISE.

"Since the centre is an official centre, it could then be perceived as the OISE position," Hyman noted.

Canadian Jewish Congress spokesperson Simon Rosenblum said the resolution presents "a prejudicial, inflammatory and highly biased view of the conflict.

"The resolution paid no attention to Israel's attempts to achieve peace nor Israel's legitimate need for self-defence," Rosenblum noted, adding that it was problematic that the centre, an institutional part of the university, seemed to be passing judgment on the Middle East situation and taking sides.

On May 15, Cecilia Reynolds, the acting dean of OISE, responded to the uncertainty over the status of the April 29 resolution by stating that it "does not constitute a formal statement of OISE/UT or the University of Toronto."

However, she added, "faculty at all ranks are protected by the principle of academic freedom, which allows them to voice unpopular or controversial ideas, short of those that are illegal or create an environment that violates other university principles such as freedom from harassment."

Prof. George Dei, who teaches anti-racism and is the incoming chair of OISE's department of sociology and equity studies in education (SESE), said "the resolution represents the position of the people who signed and does not represent the position of the Centre for Integrative Anti-Racism Studies." He declined further comment.

According to the 2002-03 OISE catalogue, the Centre for Integrative Anti-Racism Studies, which is part of SESE, brings together faculty and students whose "research interests and political commitments are in anti-racism."

The catalogue says the centre's activities include "a study of class exploitation, sexism, ableism and heterosexism."

The study of anti-Semitism is not listed in the centre's documentation, but Reynolds said "it is possible that it does get taught and just isn't listed."

The director of the centre would be the only one who would have that level of detail about the program, Reynolds said.

Razack was not available for comment.

Israel and the media

From the editor's desk

It should be obvious not only to the supporters of Israel that reportage of the conflict between Israel and the Palestinians is laden with anti-Israel bias. By reportage I do not mean analyses or commentaries, however misguided, misleading or infuriating they may be. We may disagree with others' opinions, but the holders of opinions usually make no pretense in trying to pass off their opinions as fact.

Rather, I refer to stories that purport to objectively impart news but which are infused with personal statements and conclusions. This type of reporting is offensive; indeed, it is unethical. It is a form of dishonesty.

One of the most egregious examples of this kind of "dishonest" reporting occurred in the aftermath of the army's operation in Jenin.

The Palestinian leadership immediately let loose the cry of "massacre" and "war crimes." Many NGO Palestinian supporters, EU officials and even UN officials echoed their cry. And then the cry became reported as fact in many media outlets around the world.

But, as we know, there was no massacre and there were no war crimes in Jenin, as many Palestinian combatants and non-combatants themselves reported to some of the journalists on the spot who were actually inquisitive for the truth.

Around the Jewish world, there are now a handful of media watchdogs who report on the reporting about the Middle East. One of the very best, by the way, is Paul Michaels, the Canada Israel Committee's director of communications. Michaels writes a weekly column in this paper called According to Reports, in which he incisively points out the nuances of Middle East news coverage, both good and bad.

Last December in Jerusalem, Prof. Amos Shapira, the former dean of the Faculty of Law at Tel Aviv University, chaired a panel discussion on the International Media and Public Opinion at the annual conference of the International Association of Jewish Lawyers and Jurists.

The proceedings of that discussion were published in the Spring 2002 edition of Justice, the association's journal, a publication whose pages I have occasionally excerpted in this space.

The panel consisted of Ehud Ya'ari, a leading expert on Middle Eastern Affairs and an associate editor of The Jerusalem Report; Raanan Gissin, senior adviser to Israel's Prime Minister Ariel Sharon; and Dan Pattir, editor of Justice and former press secretary to both Menachem Begin and Yitzhak Rabin.

The panelists offered some fascinating details as well as useful insights on the media's coverage of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. I reproduce only the briefest of highlights. It bears emphasizing that the discussion was held in December 2001, before the Passover massacre and before Israel's response, Operation Defensive Shield.

Ya'ari, who is renowned for the depth of his analysis and the reliability of his sources, began with a review of the chronology of the violence that began in Sept. 2000. He spoke about the events as they actually unfolded in the field and then he asked: "Why does the media get it wrong? The Palestinians have managed to turn the territories under their control into Judenrein territories. The Israeli press is unable to operate in Palestinian territories. Journalists can only operate in the territories on two conditions: either they write what the Palestinian authorities like to read... or provided they are invited and accompanied... seeing what they are allowed to see and talking to persons with whom they are allowed to talk.

"Ninety-five per cent of the video tapes coming out of the territories, covering the Intifadah are taken by Palestinian cameramen and Palestinian crews."

Gissin, who was recently in Toronto as a guest of the UJA Federation, spoke more theoretically about the intrinsic, structural nature of the difficulties faced by Israel in relation to the media's presentation of its side of the conflict.

"Our stories are complex stories, they cannot be told in 30 seconds. The Palestinians did a brilliant thing when they started using the media: they talked about 'rights' and we talked about 'security'.

"... Our major error throughout the years is that we never stood up and said: 'Jews also have rights.' Rights are on a higher moral pedestal than security and the Palestinians stand on that pedestal.

"... The Palestinians have not recognized the Jews' rights to this land, only their might, and that is the problem. Israel has become the strongest military power in the Middle East and its might is recognized; its rights are not and those are what have to be claimed."

Pattir expressed doubt that Israel could ever gain "some kind of understanding from the public" in light of the fact that it "ceased to be an underdog in 1967."

Then he lamented that "we ignore the fact that the media organs try to be policy-makers themselves; they try to dictate, or engage in reporting in a way that is not only not impartial but definitely affects public opinion and consequently policy-makers here or elsewhere.

"An example of this [was] the terrible lynching at Ramallah. The behaviour of the international media was appalling. All the media were there; most were taping the whole scene. Only one courageous crew, from Italy, an independent television company, made the footage available to the Israelis and to others... Most of the other TV outlets 'volunteered' to give the tapes to the Palestinians because the Palestinians threatened them and actually confiscated tapes from the hands of certain Western outlets."

If we cannot prevent dishonest reporting, we should at least be aware of it when we see it.

Still much to do as Claims Conference hits milestone

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

On the eve of the 50th anniversary of the first agreement forged by the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany (better known as the Claims Conference), Michael Rosenberg has a lot on his plate.

As president of the Toronto-based Jewish Holocaust Survivors of Canada, Rosenberg regularly receives calls from survivors wondering how much longer they'll have to wait for compensation for their wartime slave labour.

He is involved in petitioning the conference for a grant that would fund home care for aging survivors.

And he has just received word that the government of Germany has proposed extending pension benefits to survivors of Nazi-controlled ghettoes during World War II.

"A lot of things are happening," Rosenberg says, "and that's good because every day, there are fewer and fewer of us."

To survivors who have applied for slave labour compensation, Rosenberg counsels patience.

To date, the Claims Conference has received 260,000 applications for compensation for slave and forced labour, and processed about 85,000 claims. So far, Germany has distributed $383 million (all figures US unless indicated) and is processing claims at the rate of 10,000 a month.

In 2000, Germany and German industries announced the creation of a $7 billion (Cdn) compensation fund for an estimated one million war-era slaves – most of them Jews who worked under extreme conditions, including in concentration camps – and one-time forced labourers, who were mainly non-Jewish civilians seconded to work on farms and infrastructure.

Rosenberg says all of Canada's 16,000 to 18,000 Jewish Holocaust survivors are eligible for compensation for slave labour, even if they did not perform it.

The first installment of payments is roughly $7,200 (Cdn), on top of about $1,000 (US) from the $1.25 billion settlement from Swiss banks made in 1998. Rosenberg said the amount of the second installment isn't known yet.

(Of the Swiss settlement, $200 million was set aside in a humanitarian fund for needy survivors worldwide. In Canada, $3.7 million Cdn was distributed to 7,091 survivors with immediate financial needs, for an average payout of $521 Cdn.)

Although recipients of payments from the conference's long-established Article 2 or Hardship funds may have already been compensated for incarceration in a ghetto, Germany announced last month that it is considering extending pension benefits to those who worked in ghettoes.

The new rules to extend social security benefits to Jews who laboured in Nazi-held ghettoes are likely to be approved by the Bundestag – the German parliament – Rosenberg said.

The proposed filing deadline is June 2003. There is no requirement to hire a lawyer when applying.

Rosenberg is also involved in pressuring the Claims Conference to approve ongoing grants for home care for ailing survivors.

"That's a very big issue for all survivors. Currently, OHIP [the Ontario Health Insurance Plan] covers 15 hours a week of home care. As people age, we need to boost that."

The Claims Conference was founded in New York in 1951 by 23 Jewish organizations and representatives of the State of Israel. Largely as a result of its efforts, more than 500,000 survivors in 67 countries have received compensation and restitution payments valued in current terms at about $50 billion.

Since the fall of the former Soviet Union, the conference has been able to reach needy survivors who had not received compensation under previous programs.

Needy "Righteous Gentiles" who saved Jews during the Holocaust also receive assistance through the conference's Foundation for the Righteous.

In all, the conference has distributed some $500 million to organizations that help needy survivors, document the Holocaust and help rebuild Jewish institutions destroyed by the Nazis.

This year, the conference is expected to disburse more than $1 billion to Holocaust survivors.

The next meeting of the Claims Conference takes place in Luxembourg July 22 and 23, and will mark the 50th anniversary of the Luxembourg Agreement, the conference's first pact, which paved the way for all the other agreements.

Canada is to be represented by Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) president Keith Landy and CJC national executive director Jack Silverstone.

Hate on Internet said growing

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

David Duke and William Pierce are heroes of the radical right in the United States, but lately the white supremacists' list of admirers has expanded in an unlikely direction – to Islamic opponents of America and Jews.

Duke, a former Grand Wizard of the Knights of the Ku Klux Klan, and Pierce, author of the Turner Diaries, the book that inspired the bombing of the Oklahoma City Federal Building, have increasingly been quoted with approval in the Mideastern press, said Rabbi Abraham Cooper, associate dean of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre in Los Angeles.

And while both American racists and Islamic radicals share a deep animosity to the American government and Jews, the Muslim press seems oblivious to the fact American racists refer to them domestically as "mud people," Cooper said.

Rabbi Cooper was in Toronto recently for the release of the centre's new CD-ROM on racist Web sites and other high tech manifestations of Jew-hatred. Titled Digital Hate 2002, the CD highlighted 200 problematic Web sites – including one that turns suicide bombings into a computer game.

The problem is massive in scale, Rabbi Cooper said. The 200 sites on the CD are sampled from a list of 3,300 URLs worldwide. Considering that moral suasion has prompted a number of Internet Service Providers (ISPs) to terminate the service of some racist sites, the growth in this kind of Web presence is troubling, he said.

The centre and other opponents of Internet hate sites have had some success, Rabbi Cooper said, persuading E-Bay, the Internet auction house, to remove Nazi memorabilia from sale.

But other sites are popping up all the time, and they are causing concern among researches. One URL offers viewers the chance to play "Kaboom," a computer game in which participants accumulate points by bombing civilians and watching body parts fly around the screen. The game opens with a picture of Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat.

Another game on the same site rewards contestants who shoot unarmed, stereotyped Africans who are wearing traditional clothing. A third game that originates in Austria is aimed at extracting as much value as possible from Turkish workers and then killing them. Yet another game encourages participants to hunt Jews while a video game, released by Pierce, is called "Ethnic Cleansing" and targets Jews and Blacks.

"You get this subculture that's flirting with racism in that way," Rabbi Cooper said.

Meanwhile, Iranian Web sites have been quoting Pierce lately and he in turn "has picked up that he's an international player" who's been cited by sites in Iran, Pakistan and by Hezbollah in Lebanon, Rabbi Cooper said.

Despite their differences, the coincidence of views on shared enemies have brought Islamic radicals and white supremacists closer together – at least on the point of hatred of Jews and the U.S. government.

"There are people in the anti-government movement who see the government as the enemy and who have more than grudging respect for the Taliban, because it weakened the [U.S.] federal government," Rabbi Cooper said.

Since the Sept. 11 attacks on the United States, sites that promote suicide bombings have sprung up in the Muslim world. An Iranian site and another hosted by Hamas have both tried to encourage and recruit suicide bombers. Rabbi Cooper noted that one Islamic cleric, Sheikh Yussef Al-Qardawi, has sanctioned women becoming suicide bombers even if their husbands disagree. (Al-Qardawi has also stated that there are no civilians in Israel, thereby justifying attacks on unarmed women and children.)

At one point, Internet advocates argued the World Wide Web would be a great democratizing tool in the Muslim world. But, Cooper says, extremists have carved out their own niche, developing sites in Arabic and Farsi.

UJA Federation holds annual meeting

UJA Federation will be expending greater effort to enlist support for Israel outside the Jewish community according to Ralph Shedletsky, chair of UJA Federation's board.

"This past year, as a community, we witnessed profound and historical events and challenges that impacted us emotionally, spiritually, and intellectually," said Shedletsky, at the recent UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's 85th annual general meeting.

"For most, if not all of us, the state of siege in Israel, and the experience of a different yet no less disturbing sense of feeling singled out and under attack for our defence of Israel and for being a Jew, occupied our hearts and minds.

"We plan to expand UJA's efforts to promote the understanding of Israel's position beyond the Jewish community."

Also at the meeting, Leslie Gales, vice-chair, awarded 10 people with leadership and campaigning awards.

Abe Glowinsky received UJA's highest honour in campaigning, the Granovsky Award, named after the late community leader, Phil Granovsky.

Winners of the UJA Leadership Development Awards – Richard Diamond and Allan Gales – were also announced.

Seven volunteers received the ShemTov Award, presented to individuals representing the highest levels of excellence in volunteer service in Toronto's Jewish community.

This year's winners are: Rhona Shulman, UJA's Board of Jewish Education; Helen Finder Guttman, Bathurst Jewish Community Centre; Bernice Royce, Circle of Care; Agi Mandel, Jewish Campus Services; Stephanie Olin-Chapman, Kehilla Residential Programme; Mark Sarner, Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, and Alan Motsyn, Toronto Jewish Free Loan Cassa.

A catastrophic leader

As these words were being written, Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon had just arrived in Washington for his sixth visit with U.S. President George W. Bush. Sharon landed in Washington shortly after Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak left. Before Mubarak, Bush met with Jordan's King Abdullah. Before Abdullah, Bush heard the counsel of the crown prince of Saudi Arabia.

It's clear that the U.S. administration is intent on trying to fashion a political initiative to lift some of the dead and dying air between Israel and the Palestinian leadership. But whether the flurry of high-level consultations is merely stage-managed motion or actual diplomatic movement will only become clear in the days and months ahead. What is clear however, is that no progress in the political process can result unless there is progress in ending the campaign of violence against Israelis. But an end to the violence will occur only when the Palestinian people themselves decide once and for all to spurn violence and to cast out its planners and perpetrators from within their midst. Alas, that appears not to be happening.

"On the eve of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's visit to Washington," Ze'ev Schiff wrote in Ha'aretz, "it is clear Palestinian terrorism is on the increase; not a day goes by without Israeli casualties."

The Palestinian people, the majority of whom, one hopes, simply want to live in peace, are trapped in a never-ending whorl of violence spun by an autocratic, corrupt and prevaricating leadership. And they appear incapable of changing that leadership. The so-called political reforms last weekend by the Palestinian Authority prove the point.

Unfortunately, violence appears to be enjoying increasing popular support among Palestinians. Last week 17 Israelis were killed near Megiddo. Two weeks ago, an 18-year-old Palestinian walked up to a cafe in Petach Tikvah, crowded with children and their parents, detonated the bomb strapped to his body, killing himself and an older woman and her infant granddaughter.

The National Post reported that when the murderer called his mother to bid her goodbye, she said to him, albeit tearfully: "Oh son, I hope your operation will succeed." After the murders, the boy's father added: "I would hope that my son would be a nuclear bomb, not a normal bomb, to destroy everything." The testimonies of the young murderer's parents are horrific but profoundly eloquent proof of the fact that Yasser Arafat's leadership has been catastrophic for the Palestinian people. It has been an abject moral and national failure.

He has made the distance between his people and an independent homeland far greater than it has ever been. He has alienated the trust of every mainstream Israeli from the possibility of ever making peace with him. He has increased Israeli resolve never to surrender to violence and terror. He has squandered untold millions of dollars that were intended for his people's welfare. He has built no reliable, trustworthy institution of government. But saddest of all, he has brought some Palestinian parents to the crazed, hate-filled desperation of applauding even the wilful deaths of their own children. It is long past time that, for the sake of the Palestinian people, the world asked Yasser Arafat to step aside.

Favours boycott of Europe

In recent months, The CJN has carried news of the Jewish communities in Europe, news virtually unavailable from any other Canadian source. Your editorials have been strong in support of those communities. Letters to the editor have suggested that we should show our individual support of our European Jewish family, not only by gathering at peaceful public protests, but also by taking personal action such as writing letters to the governments concerned and to the press and by boycotting the countries that have demonstrated a lack of concern towards acts of anti-Semitism.

To that end, my wife and I have just cancelled a two week trip to Paris which we had been planning since last fall. Our cousins from Finland were to meet us there. They too have cancelled. We will instead be vacationing in Canada, as will our Finnish cousins. I don't know if four people not going to Paris out of the millions that do go will make a difference, but we all felt that in good conscience, we could not spend our money in a country in which the government appears to allow acts of anti-Semitism to go unchallenged.

Opposes boycott of Europe

A boycott of French goods would not in the least way contribute to alleviating anti-Semitism in France and might even alienate some people. You don't punish a whole nation because 10 per cent of them are prejudiced. If we did that, we would need to boycott most of the world, including the United States. Even Canada is not entirely free of prejudices against some minorities. Some French importers may be Jewish. Do we want to punish them too? I doubt that French Jews will agree to a boycott. Many of them escaped Adolf Hitler and were helped by some French good samaritans.

We won't get National Front leader Jean-Marie Le Pen soundly defeated by boycotting French imports. There are better ways to oppose anti-Semitism.

Many issues still on Jewish agenda

Although the primary concern of the Jewish community at this time must be Israel, which we must support morally and materially, we must not lose sight at the same time of other issues, which the Jewish community and federations must address.

Among these issues are:

- Ensuring that children receive a good Jewish education, whether at a day school or supplementary Hebrew school without lack of affordability being a deterrent to access. As Rabbi Aaron Soloveitchik so eloquently put it: "If a child desires a Jewish eduction, the community is required to provide it."
- Ensuring that lack of affordability does not prevent children from attending Jewish camps, especially in view of the fact that Jewish federations provide funding for such an express purpose.
- Ensuring that every effort is made by the various Jewish denominations and the community to provide means for Jewish singles to meet, whether for socialization or matrimonial purposes.

When addressing their congregations, rabbis must be alert not only to the situation in Israel, but should also, for the good of the community, emphasize these other issues.

Israel's painful sacrifice

The Jenin "massacre," propagandized by the Arabs and certain European journalists, has now been exposed as the first great media hoax of the 21st century. Still, most of the world always wants to believe the worst of Israel.

I will never understand why the Israel Defence Forces had to sacrifice 23 of Israel's finest in ground combat in Jenin, for fear of hurting civilians, when it could have pulverized the barbarous enemy from the air, as the Americans have done in Afghanistan. Why did Israel need to prove its morality before a deceitful and wicked world?

The 1941 pogrom in Baghdad: 'We cannot afford to forget our past'

By NAIM DALLAL

Sixty-one years ago, on June 1 and 2 of 1941 – the two days of Shavuot that year – the Mufti-inspired, pro-Nazi coup of Rasheed Ali Al Gaylani incited a pogrom (farhood in Arabic) in Baghdad, Iraq, that resulted in the murder of nearly 200 Jews and the wounding of almost 1,000.

That such atrocities were committed against the oldest Jewish community in the Diaspora, a society that had lived in Babylonia (modern Iraq) for more than 2,500 years since the destruction of the first Temple, remains a source of sorrow for not only myself, but for Jews around the world.

Prior to the farhood of 1941, Iraqi Jews lived under numerous regimes, from the Arabs and Persians to the Mongols and the Turks, with varying degrees of human rights and freedoms. But never before did the Iraqi Jewish community experience such success as under the rule of King Faysal.

Israel stamp issued in 1970 commemorating the 20th anniversary of "Operation Ezra and Nehemia"

Crowned in 1921 after a referendum controlled by the British administration, King Faysal insisted on the equal treatment of Jews in the newly created Iraqi kingdom. Jews received appointments in several key posts in the government. The first finance minister was Jewish, as was the chief justice of the Supreme Court. Iraqi Jews held key positions in transportation, the administration of railways and the ministries of interiors and foreign affairs. The community boasted famous schools, hospitals and clinics as well as talented professors, doctors, lawyers and engineers. And Jewish delegates were elected to the Iraqi parliament in accordance with a quota system that allowed for a maximum of six Jewish members of parliament and one Jewish senator.

In fact, according to government sources, the Iraqi Jewish population reached 120,000 in the 1930s, representing 2.5 per cent of the nation's population. And Jews of Baghdad, the vast majority of whome were Orthodox, accounted for 25 per cent of the city's people.

Unfortunately, the favourable conditions that allowed the Iraqi Jewish community to flourish soon deteriorated, laying the groundwork for death and destruction.

Persecution and discrimination of Jews in Iraq started in the early '30s when Adolf Hitler came to power in Germany and the conflict between Jews and Arabs in the Holy Land was exaggerated by Nazi agents in Arab countries, who spread the propaganda that Jews committed atrocities against the Arab population. At the centre of this campaign of hatred was the grand mufti of Jerusalem, Haj Amin El Husseini, and the German ambassador to Iraq.

In 1936, several Jews were murdered in Baghdad, which brought horror and concern to our peaceful people. In response, Jewish establishments waged a strike. It was a bold move that was called off only after the authorities assured our chief rabbi that the safety of Jewish citizens would be a priority of the Iraqi government.

In 1941, Al Gaylani, who had strong anti-British leanings and was assisted by the Iraqi army's chief of staff and four powerful colonels, conducted a successful coup d'etat, deposing the pro-British regent of the throne, Prince Abdul Ilah and his right-hand man Nuri Al-Said, who had his own strong following. Forced to leave Iraq, this group fled to Jordan (then known as Transjordan).

Al Gaylani, together with the Iraqi Army, was humiliated by the Arab (Transjordanian) Legion under the command of the British general Glubb Pasha, who was sent by Prince Abdullah of Transjordan (who later became the king of Jordan) to support his nephew, the regent of the Iraqi throne.

However, on June 1, 1941, the first day of Shavuot, Al Gaylani, his officers and the mufti fled to Persia, and a self-appointed committee was established to supposedly enforce law and order until the regent officially took over. At this time, the regent and the British army were stationed in the western section of Baghdad.

At about 4 p.m. of the same day, the pogrom started against the Jewish community and lasted all night. Stores were looted, hundreds of Jews were killed, Jewish girls were kidnapped and raped, many Jewish people were declared missing and houses were burned. Neither the regent, who was in full command of the army, nor the British troops tried to stop the atrocity and save our defenceless people. In fact, history tells us that in the following days, a group of young Jewish men successfully smuggled arms into Baghdad and trained themselves to fight in the event of a repeat occurrence. Following the exile of Iraqi Jews, authorities discovered the weapons amassed by the brave men.

In 1948, the Arab countries invaded Israel and martial law in Iraq was declared on the pretext that the security of the nation was threatened by the Zionist fifth column. Many Jews were arrested on false charges and tortured or sentenced to hard labour, and their assets were confiscated. Many Jews were fired from their jobs and replaced by Muslims with lower qualifications. Professionals were ordered to move out of the cities they were practising in or be faced with arrest. Heavy restrictions and regulations were imposed on Jewish merchants. Colleges rejected Jewish students, and Jews were forbidden to travel.

By 1950, many Jews had no choice but to leave Iraq in order to escape the continuous persecution. But the government only permitted them to depart on the condition that they renounce their Iraqi nationality. Once their nationality was renounced, the government immediately froze their assets and seized their property. If the Jews who had left Iraq before 1950 did not return within three months, they were stripped of their nationality and their assets were frozen in their absence.

In 1969, Jews were hung in public squares and their bodies left dangling to the delight of the Muslim crowds. Since that time, many Jews have vanished. The government claims they ran away to Israel, but the truth is they were kidnapped and murdered, and the government seized their property. Also in 1969, synagogues under government control were confiscated and converted to factories for homes for Palestinian refugees. Some Sifrei Torah are considered government "heritage" property and have been placed in museums as antiques, but cannot leave the country.

To date, nearly one million Jews have been forced to flee Arab countries, leaving behind them a trail of blood and tears. Fortunately, many exiled Jews have been absorbed by Israel, a country that, despite its small size and limited resources, has never turned its back on its own people.

All of which raises questions about the Arab nations' treatment of the Palestinian refugees. Six Arab countries invaded the newly formed country of Israel in 1948, ignoring the United Nations' resolution that created the Jewish state, humiliating Palestinian refugees and thrusting the Palestinian refugee problem onto the shoulders of a nascent country.

Israel's treatment of the Jewish refugees, on the other hand, has been nothing short of miraculous. It has absorbed Jews from such places as Yemen, Syria, Egypt, North Africa, and of course, Iraq. The result is a nation that is not only certain to survive the actions of its modern-day enemies, but one that simply cannot afford to forget the terrible pogroms of its past.

Born in Baghdad, Naim Dallal is a dentist in Toronto. The founder of the Iraqi Jewish Association, he is currently on the national executive committee of Canadian Jewish Congress.

Why didn't they?

As I write, the current issue of Time magazine is headlined: "While America Slept." The sub-heading reads: "Why so little was done."

The headline referred to reports that the Bush administration received warnings before Sept. 11 that Al Qaeda might hijack airplanes. I read the accompanying article with some interest, but even more so with amusement. Not that the subject matter was funny – quite the contrary. What struck my funny bone, however, was the rather simplistic implication that Sept. 11 might have been prevented if the people concerned had realized the full extent of the potential threat. It makes for interesting reading, but it has little to do with reality.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

As an example, I will cite a question that I hear time and again. When Nazi Germany is being discussed, people inevitably ask me:"Why didn't the German Jews leave the country before it was too late?"

The reason was simple: there had been no precedent of any political party behaving the way the Nazis did once they came to power, and even some Nazis were not fully aware of what was being done to the Jews. There was simply no precedent, but the Monday-morning quarterbacks of course know what should have been done.

Jews had lived in Germany for thousands of years. They had come with the Romans in the first and second centuries and, on the whole, they had fared reasonably well. Jews experienced various kinds of governmental oppression, and they usually stuck them out. But no one could have anticipated what the Nazis would eventually do. At the time, they were judged to be like similar regimes before them. The fact they turned out to be very different was not anticipated by Jews or, for that matter, by anyone else, including many Nazis themselves.

Of course, today we know that the Jews in Germany and Poland and other countries would have been smart to leave before it was too late. Afterwards, it is always simple to make the right judgment, and that's the way the Time headlines struck me.

I found it interesting to hear the U.S. president announce recently that, sooner or later, America would again be struck by terrorists, but neither he nor anyone else has any idea from where such attacks will come and what nefarious activities will take place. Afterward, of course – if in fact there is another attack – many of us will be moved to say "We should have known."

Yes, Jews should have left Germany earlier but, relying on 2,000 years of fairly positive experience, we had no sense of the terrible future that lay ahead.

In sum, Monday morning quarterbacking is one thing; calling the shots on Sunday is another.

From Beirut to Ramallah

Many feel that to understand the events of the last two years, one has to begin with the Lebanon story. In retrospect, the 1982 Lebanon War was a "first" in several critical ways – all of which represented a sober awakening from earlier myths of Israeli military omnipotence and a blind acceptance of the establishment's position. As Israelis mark its 20th anniversary, it is striking to note the similarities and differences between that war and the debate over the current war against Palestinian terrorism.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

Lebanon was the first war in which the phrase " a war of choice" was coined to question the very reason for the military action. Because there was no consensus on the need for the push to Beirut, it was the first war that was criticized even as it was being waged. The famous article by journalist Amiram Nir, Quiet, They're Shooting, in which he called for a halt to the criticism until the end of the war, was essentially rejected by his colleagues in the Israeli press. Their position was that since there was a choice inherent in that war, the patriotic thing to do was to raise the questions.

The dissent also spilled into the streets. For the first time in Israel's history, reserve soldiers held demonstrations once they returned home from their stint of duty. And Eli Geva, a colonel in the Israel Defence Forces, challenged the scope of the war while in uniform, thereby creating another significant precedent.

Further, Lebanon was the first war in which Israeli soldiers came face to face with civilians and in which they encountered terrorists using civilians as human shields. The PLO was scattered throughout the villages of southern Lebanon, and it was impossible to distinguish fighters from civilians whom they held as virtual hostages or who actively supported them.

Soldiers and civilians agonized over the legal and moral questions that arose as a result of this new reality. Ricochets-Shtei Etzba'ot Mitsidon, a film produced by the IDF itself, shaped the public debate over the impossible choices soldiers had to make. Israelis' consciousness of these issues came to a head in the public outcry after the massacre in the Sabra and Shatila refugee camps. Although Israel was in no way responsible for the violence perpetrated by its Lebanese Christian allies, the public reacted as though it was. The Kahan Commission's subsequent inquiry was a further indication of the seriousness attached by Israelis to the new circumstances of war.

Finally, Lebanon was the first case in which the Israeli army withdrew unilaterally from territory it controlled as a result of war. In 1985, Israel's unity government, led by Shimon Peres and Yitzchak Shamir, withdrew the IDF from most of the area it had controlled since 1982. The IDF remained in a narrow security zone just north of the border, as a compromise between the Labour party, which wanted to withdraw completely, and Likud and the IDF, who wanted to keep forces in Lebanon. Twenty years later, prime minister Ehud Barak terminated Israel's controversial presence there and withdrew the IDF, due to intense public pressure over the large number of Israeli casualties at the hands of Hezbollah. Looking back, it is not at all clear if the continued presence in the security zone in fact saved Israeli lives, or if a full withdrawal in 1985 might have been the more prudent choice.

Today, both sides in the Israeli political debate use the withdrawal from Lebanon to reinforce their positions. "Doves" argue that it saved soldiers' lives, while "hawks" blame the unilateral withdrawal for the PLO's perception that Israel could be forced to do the same in the West Bank and Gaza. Both arguments are correct.

For Israelis generally, however, there is a major difference between Lebanon and today. The current war against suicide bombers is viewed as a war of no choice, and as a result, public and media debate and dissent have been far more muted. As in the case of Lebanon, only history will provide a more complete perspective on the results of Operation Defensive Shield. However, it is already clear that any military gains from the incursion will last only if translated into an aggressive diplomatic initiative aimed at achieving a political settlement.

Gay pride in Jerusalem

A gay pride parade was to have taken place in Jerusalem last Friday, in the midst of some controversy. Actually, the controversy is good news, as it focuses Israeli attention away from daily political and security worries to another aspect of life.

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

While the parade should take place, apparently gay and lesbian activists have asked the Israeli High Court to order the city of Jerusalem to help fund it. The judges are seeking to find out what kind of support the municipality offers to other parades before rendering a decision. The municipality has agreed to provide security fencing and flags for the gay pride parade, but organizers understandably seek equal treatment.

The debate on the parade has triggered some nasty commentary from one Nissim Ze'ev, a member of Knesset from the haredi Shas party. In a radio interview, he reportedly compared homosexuality to having a "pig in the Holy Temple" and warned that homosexuals could spread AIDS and turn Israel into "a second Africa."

Most North American cities have large gay pride parades, just as they do parades for all manner of groups and causes. The opposition voiced by some residents is not seen as weakening the free speech and free association rights of gays and lesbians. Those opposed to homosexuality need not attend the parades.

The fact that a large segment, and possibly a majority, of Jerusalem's population – both Jewish (especially Orthodox) and Muslim – might share Ze'ev's hostility to homosexuality is irrelevant. It is minorities that need to have their right of free expression protected.

While Orthodoxy remains officially opposed to homosexual practices and does not countenance gay Jewish marriages or gay rabbis, there is change afoot from the ground up. Apparently some of the gays and lesbians interested in marching in the Jerusalem parade are Orthodox themselves.

The recent movie Trembling Before God traces the anguish and dilemmas facing gay Orthodox Jews. I know of no reliable statistical evidence about the proportion of gay and lesbian Jews in the ranks of the Orthodox, but they do exist. Some of the more liberal Orthodox synagogues may well have evolved a kind of "don't ask, don't tell" approach to shul members who are thought to be gay.

The organized Jewish community in North America has generally supported equal opportunity and non-discrimination for gays and lesbians. This is part of a more general civil rights position. After initial periods of resistance, gay Jewish organizations, including congregations, were openly established and incorporated into wider Jewish communal frameworks. Jewish social service agencies and professionals invariably take a non-discriminatory approach to such issues as they arise.

Moreover, individual Jews, being generally liberal on social issues, would be less likely to openly express homophobia, to discriminate against gays, or to engage in gay-bashing or the like.

But this tolerance is far from universal. Many Jewish parents do not fully accept the sexual choices of their gay children. Family relations can, and do, become severely strained. As a result, many Jewish gays and lesbians are reportedly still "in the closet," at least to family and some relatives. And these tensions are likely more severe among the more religious elements of the community.

The holding of a gay pride parade in Jerusalem has symbolic importance for Jews everywhere. While traditional Jews in Jerusalem are certainly free to express their reservations about homosexuality, the holding of the parade could be seen as entrenching a spirit of pluralism both within Israel and the wider Jewish community. This is all to the good. Moreover, suicide bombers blowing up pizzerias in Jerusalem do not worry about the sexual orientation of their victims.

A 'localized' conflict with great consequences

The Six Day War broke out 35 years ago this month. It was Israel's most brilliant military feat of arms, bar none. The triumph had widespread repercussions. It sowed the seeds of the 1967-1970 War of Attrition and the 1973 Yom Kippur War, which in turn laid the groundwork for Israel's historic 1979 peace treaty with Egypt.

In addition, the Six Day War galvanized Palestinian nationalism and touched off a passionate national debate about the final disposition of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, the political fallout of which haunts Israel to this day.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

" Rarely in modern times has so short and localized a conflict had such prolonged, global consequences," writes Michael Oren in his magnum opus, Six Days of War, published by Oxford University Press.

Oren, having had the benefit of access to declassified documents, has made the best of this opportunity. His cogently-written book sets a new gold standard of scholarship. He devotes 169 pages to the crises that triggered the war, the third in Israel's history, and almost as many pages to the war itself.

Its causes are clear.

Syria, citing Algeria's recent victory over France, called for a " people's war" to defeat Israel, which Arabs viewed as an outpost of Western imperialism. Backing up this proclamation with provocative steps, the Syrians actively supported raids by the newly-formed Palestine Liberation Organization into Israel, tried to divert the headwaters of the Jordan River and attempted to stop Israel's cultivation of the demilitarized zones in the northern Galilee.

In the face of mounting border incidents with Israel, Syria accused Egypt's president, Gamal Abdel Nasser, of "going soft" on Israel. Nasser, unwilling to be outmanoeuvred by rival Syria, became embroiled in the anti-Israel frenzy sweeping the Arab world. Nasser knew full well that Egypt was unprepared for a war. Nevertheless, he ordered United Nations peacekeeping troops out of the Sinai Peninsula and closed the Gulf of Aqaba to Israeli shipping. Israel, rightly, regarded these moves as a casus belli.

Meanwhile, King Hussein of Jordan foolishly entered into a military alliance with Egypt. The Soviet Union stoked the tension by cynically circulating false reports about an Israeli buildup of forces along the Syrian frontier. Israel's prime minister, Levi Eshkol, was reluctant to launch a pre-emptive strike against Egypt. But when he concluded that the United States had no quick and viable plan to restore the status quo ante in the Gulf of Aqaba and the Sinai, the die was cast for war.

Egypt, bogged down in a war in Yemen, realized that Israel had two options: to accept the new situation or to attack. "We must expect the enemy to strike a blow within 48 to 72 hours, by June 5 at the latest," Nasser presciently told his generals on June 2.

Although Nasser, privately, was none too eager to fight Israel, he found himself in a quandary of his own making, Oren observes. He could only recall his army from Sinai at the risk of humiliation. A continuing buildup, on the other hand, would greatly enhance his stature as an Arab leader. Nasser hoped he could remilitarize the Sinai without risking war. It was a huge mistake.

The Syrians, the original instigators of the slide toward war, miscalculated too. Syria, having refused to co-ordinate its policies with Egypt, had prepared a strategy to conquer northern Israel in six days. Syria would seize Kibbutz Mishmar Hayarden and the settlements in the Dan region, capture Tiberias and Safed and then regroup to take Afula, Nazareth and Haifa. The defence minister, Mustafa Tlass, thought that Syria, in league with Egypt, could destroy Israel in four days.

Fearing Soviet intervention, Moshe Dayan, Israel's defence minister, rejected a full-scale war with Syria. Dayan's reluctance to confront Syria was nothing new: Israel's massive retaliatory raid into the Jordanian village of Samu, on Nov. 13, 1966, had been ostensibly meant to punish Palestinian villages in the Hebron area which had aided Fatah guerrillas in attacking Israel. In actuality, Samu was an indirect warning to Syria to desist from heating up the border with Israel.

Oren claims that, beyond the goals of destroying the Egyptian army and eliminating the threat from Egypt, Israel had no intention of expanding the war into the West Bank, the Golan Heights or even eastern Jerusalem. As he puts it: "The vagaries and momentum of war, far more than rational decision-making, shaped the fighting's results."

In this vein, Oren quotes Rechavam Ze'evi, then deputy chief of operations and later minister of tourism in Ariel Sharon's cabinet, as saying: "The Israeli government never set specific goals for the war. The objectives rose from the bottom up, from the military to the political echelon."

The Six Day War started at 7:10 am when waves of Magister Fouga jets, followed by Ouragon bombers and Mirage fighters, took off from airfields at Hatzor and Ramat David. Flying low to avoid detection, and observing radio silence, the planes swung west toward the Mediterranean and south toward the Red Sea. Almost all of Egypt's aircraft were on the ground. In an incredible gamble, Israel left only 12 planes to defend its airspace. Within about 30 minutes, Egypt had lost 204 planes, half its air force. By the end of the day, Egyptian losses had jumped to 286, a fact of which Nasser was blissfully unaware. Nasser had been informed that the tide of battle had turned in Egypt's favour.

Gamal Abdel Nasser

Through the United Nations, Israel warned Jordan to stay out of the hostilities. Jordan, having been misled by fantastic Arab claims of stirring victories, walked pell-mell into a disaster. Jordanian artillery bombed the suburbs of Tel Aviv and Ramat David. Jordanian planes strafed Netanya, Kfar Saba and Kfar Sirkin. Jordanian howitzers fired 6,000 shells into West Jerusalem, killing 20 civilians, wounding about 1,000 and damaging over 900 buildings, notably the Hadassah Hospital.

Moshe Dayan

Israel struck back, first with punishing air raids and then by capturing East Jerusalem and the rest of the West Bank. Shlomo Goren, the Israel Defence Forces' chief rabbi, called on Uzi Narkiss, the Israeli commander, to demolish the Temple Mount's mosques, but he chose to ignore the request.

Jordan's offensive drew the Syrian and Iraqi air forces into the war. Syria bombed settlements in the Galilee, while Iraq hit settlements in the Jezreel Valley, including Dayan's village, Nahalal. An Iraqi Topolov bomber that crashed wiped out 16 Israeli troops in one fell swoop. Israel retaliated, hitting several Syrian air bases and one Iraqi base. When Iraq's 8th Brigade tried to cross into the West Bank, Israeli aircraft decimated it.

Syria raised the possibility of striking Israel through Lebanon, but the Lebanese government resisted. Syria then proceeded to shell Israeli settlements on a 30-mile front. Residents lobbied Dayan to invade the Golan, but he declined, as did Eshkol.

Dayan's opposition to taking on the Syrians was such that he preferred to move vulnerable Israeli settlements out of Syrian artillery range. Subsequently, Dayan changed his mind, and Israel stormed the Golan. In an intriguing footnote, Oren says that Yitzhak Rabin, the chief of staff, cancelled orders to take the southern Golan. David Elazar, the head of northern command, basically countermanded the order.

The cautiousness Dayan displayed with respect to the Golan applied to the Gaza Strip as well. Dayan forbade a thrust into Gaza, not wishing to embroil the army in the horror of urban warfare or to saddle Israel with the responsibility for 250,000 Palestinian refugees. Rabin, however, overruled him.

The United States was essentially ambivalent about Israel's successes. Dean Rusk, the secretary of state, was relieved that Israel had not been driven into the sea. Lyndon Johnson, the president, regretted that Israel had not given diplomacy sufficient time.

Oren discusses the USS Liberty incident – during which Israel fired on an American reconnaissance ship off Gaza's coast and killed 34 sailors and wounded 171 – at length.

In 132 hours of war, Israel sustained casualties of 800 dead and 2,563 wounded. Egypt lost between 10,000 and 15,000 soldiers, and Jordan and Syria 700 and 450, respectively. Materially speaking, Arab losses were fearsome. Egypt lost most of its military equipment, which was worth $2 billion (US). It was promptly replaced by the Soviet Union. In all, the Arabs lost 469 aircraft. By comparison, Israel lost 36 planes (and 18 pilots), or 20 per cent of its air power.

On June 19, 1967, Israel secretly decided to exchange Sinai and the Golan for peace treaties with Egypt and Syria. The idea met with fierce resistance in cabinet and was tacitly dropped.

Israel won a great victory in the Six Day War, but was unable to translate it into peace. Israel would have to fight several more wars to come within reach of a rapprochement with some of its Arab enemies.

A new Zionism

Comment

By SHIRA GOLDBERG

The urgency to visit Israel is increasing as it shifts from a state of crisis to catharsis. I recently returned from a volunteer mission to Israel with 70 young Canadians. This trip provided me with an understanding of the new Zionism.

In the 19th century, and until 1967, Zionism had a positive connotation, as settlers reclaimed their land in a vibrant display of self-determination. However, since the Six Day War, negative propaganda has influenced a new inimical view of Zionism, one that is being defined by the anti-Zionists. This anti-Zionism has been embraced by journalists around the world. Even some of my Jewish peers at McGill University have bought into the anti-Zionist dialectic advanced to promote the Palestinian struggle. That is what prompted me to participate in the mission.

My experience demonstrated the importance of establishing personal connections with Israelis. I seized every opportunity to chat in Hebrew with the Israeli soldiers on the army base, our tour guides and the guest speakers. I strongly encourage everyone with family and friends in Israel to maintain their ties through frequent communication and, especially, through regular trips to Israel. It is also vital to forge new connections, for example by adopting an Israeli family victimized by terrorist bombings.

Our sages teach us: Kol Yisrael arevim zeh lazeh, that all of Israel is responsible for one another. As a community, we must take responsibility for our distressed Israeli brethren.

The Israeli economy has been severely weakened as a result of the intifadah. On my visit, I witnessed firsthand the misery of tour guides forced to become taxi drivers, Jaffa artists who did not bother to open their shops, restaurant owners with no clientele. There is an obvious correlation between fear and economic decline. Thus, visiting Israel and spending money there has immense political, as well as economic, benefits. The majority of both Israelis and Palestinians understand that war hinders tourism and other industries. A resurgence in tourism would stimulate and stabilize the Israeli economy.

When the volunteer program ended, I toured Israel for a week with my father. He introduced me to several Israeli family friends who received us very warmly. I felt an immediate bond with my host families, many of whom have maintained enduring relationships with my grandparents and parents. These unique "generational friendships" transcend barriers of space and time and unite the Jewish people. The trip underlined to me the importance of shmirat hakesher, keeping the connection.

On the last night of the mission, all the participants gathered to assess the trip's significance. One group member pointed out that while the trip gave us the opportunity to volunteer and display our solidarity, it also led to an important new affiliation of young leaders across Canada. Along with heartfelt friendships, the trip facilitated the development of ideas for helping Israel. On our bus rides to and from our volunteer stations, we discussed joint investments in Israel and collaborated on models for future trips. Even after the day's activities had ended, heated philosophical debates about Zionist and Jewish ideologies went on late into the night.

Many of the participants had expressed their sense of helplessness as detached individuals before visiting Israel. Now, lasting bonds have been created amongst a group that intends to be an active part of the future Jewish leadership in Canada.

For myself, the trip was a revitalizing experience that infused me with a renewed sense of Jewish purpose. I believe it is imperative that we repopulate the tourist sites, invigorate the economy and cultivate personal relationships in Israel. Once again, we must make the desert bloom.

Is it anti-Semitism or paranoia?

Guest Voice

By RABBI CHAIM STEINMETZ

Rena, a survivor of the Holocaust, once told me about her youth in Budapest, and her friendships, both Jewish and non-Jewish. But after the war, Rena told me, "it wasn't the same... I simply don't feel comfortable around non-Jews."

The sad secret of Jewish life in the Diaspora is that most of us are not completely comfortable with non-Jews. Often, we are hyper-sensitive to any hint of anti-Semitism, to the point of paranoia. This is understandable; centuries of Crusades, pogroms and Holocausts tend to do that to people. While understandable, this paranoia is also dangerous.

Yes, anti-Semitism is on the rise. Look at the Arab world, France, Durban, Saskatoon, Quebec City, Toronto, Concordia University, and of course, Israel. (I won't bother repeating the details; I'm sure you get the point just by reading the list.) There is also no question that many times in the course of Jewish history we have been foolishly optimistic. (Like it's twin brother paranoia, naiveté is also the product of persecution, the excessive optimism of a people desperate for a better future.) Most German Jews were proud, patriotic citizens, eager to prove their loyalty to the Fatherland, and then Adolf Hitler arrived. Too many German Jews dismissed Hitler as a noisy demagogue and thought their beloved fellow citizens, the products of a superior culture, would prevent anything wrong from happening. They were wrong.

This naiveté was at work during the Oslo peace process. Many of us – myself included – strongly supported the peace process as the best alternative for Israel's future. But, as it turned out, we made a mistake. The Oslo accords were the right plan with the wrong partner. Like Theodor Herzl after the Dreyfus trial, we've started to realize that we can't always depend on the kindness of enemies.

Having been burned by misplaced idealism, it is tempting to become paranoid. Amy Wilentz, in the May 6 issue of New York Magazine, writes about the fear that many American Jews are feeling. She quotes different columnists, including Ron Rosenbaum, who talks about the possibility of a "second Holocaust" and Nat Hentoff, who says, "As I've said before, if a loudspeaker goes off and a voice says, 'All Jews gather in Times Square,' it could never surprise me." This, frankly, is paranoia, and paranoia is costly.

Paranoia sows distrust and causes us to snub genuine friends. One of the most encouraging pieces of news in the past 20 months has been the enormous support evangelical Christians have given Israel. The response of Jewish organizations in the United States and Canada has been decidedly cool. This reflects paranoia at work.

We see the evangelicals as too rural, too western, too conservative to truly like Jews. Some see evangelical support of Israel as a ploy to convert Jews. It could be that conversion motivates some evangelicals, but the vast majority support Israel unconditionally, and the support they give is remarkable.

Last year, I was part of a group of rabbis who went to Ottawa to lobby in support of Israel. One of our meetings was with James Lunney, a freshman member of Parliament from British Columbia who is an evangelical Christian. He told me he has been to Israel 13 times, and he told me how much he was doing to support Israel. His support was purely personal, as he has very few Jews in his riding. After the meeting, I realized what a shame it is that our community has not built partnerships with Israel's strongest supporters.

Ultimately, paranoia turns Jew against Jew. Like an auto-immune disease, paranoia eventually attacks those closest to us. If the world is out to get us, then Jews who don't share our paranoia must be out to get us too. A good example of this are the ads in New York's Jewish Press signed by "Jewish Victims of Oslo" with hate-filled messages aimed at Israeli leaders who deviate from the group's extreme political views. The ads see Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, former prime minister Ehud Barak and even Prime Minister Ariel Sharon as disloyal to Israel. These views, expressed in defence of Israel, are actually self destructive. The tragic, but inevitable conclusion of this type of thinking is the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin. Paranoia is not a tolerable eccentricity. Unchecked, it is extremely dangerous.

There is a crisis. Israel is under attack, and in Europe there has been a dramatic increase in anti-Semitism. We have real enemies, but we have phantom enemies as well. What we need to do is fight our enemies, trust our friends, and have the wisdom to know the difference between anti-Semitism and paranoia.

The enormous loss

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

In the Torah readings this month we are told of the deaths of two leaders in Israel and foretold of the death of a third. We read of Miriam's death first, and shortly thereafter Moses is told he will die before entering the Land. We subsequently read of Aaron's death.

Three siblings, three pivotal leaders – the loss is enormous. Each of them has lived a unique life and fulfilled a distinct leadership role, and each portrays a different death from which we learn many things.

Miriam's death, the first loss, appears to us suddenly with no preparation for the event. We are not told of an illness or an accident or a weakening of the body as her years progress. We are suddenly and quite surprisingly informed of her death. This kind of sudden death in an older person is termed by the rabbis as "death by a kiss." In other words, God has taken this person quite suddenly yet quite tenderly. It is almost as if God has waited as long as He could and now cannot wait any longer to have this person next to Him. We are unprepared for it.

There are no words of comfort in the text and there is no expression of mourning. Perhaps the shock deprives us of the reality of the loss and the healing cannot yet begin.

Aaron's death is different and unique in that Moses is told it will happen and Aaron is ushered to his death by his brother and his son.

There is a private and proper transfer of priesthood from Aaron to his son and Aaron then dies peacefully. This death is not sudden, for it is known and expected by all. Loose threads are tied together and leadership is transferred so that a smooth transition is already in place before the death.

But we see that no preparation can result in true readiness in these matters. When Israel sees that Aaron has died they mourn for 30 days. Perhaps the awareness of the coming event allowed the people to begin to let go of Aaron and they are now ready to mourn and heal.

Moses' death is likewise unique in that he is not told the time of his demise but rather the limit that will be put on his life. In other words, Moses is not given a date upon which he will die but a historical marker that he may not pass. Moses will not enter the Land of Israel; it is this event that serves as the border for his lifetime. The reality of this awareness is that Moses' remaining years are now framed for him and he realizes his limitation. When Moses dies, Israel will mourn him and the text will eulogize him in a profound manner.

With the deaths of these three leaders we learn of the realities of life. There are those who leave us suddenly, those who know their time will shortly end and those who know the limitations of their lives. Death is never welcomed but always a loss – it always leaves a gap. The Talmud states that when the soul leaves the body, its cry goes from one end of the world to the other. We are too wrapped in our own tears to hear its anguish.

Three leaders, brothers and a sister – unique in every moment of their lives. Every year we read of their deaths, every year we feel the loss of their leadership. We have no gravesides to visit, no gravestones to erect. Yet we find comfort in the Talmud when it states: "No monuments need be put up for the righteous – their words are their monuments."

How to help Israel – Part 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Today, we continue looking at the many resources on the Internet that you can use to help Israel through its current crisis.

Give Tzedakah: Here's a challenge from Uri Miller, Ovadiah Jacob and Gershon Strauchler, three students at Yeshiva University in New York. "Project One Percent" calls on high school and college students to pledge at least 1 per cent of their summer income to support Jewish victims of terror [http://www.pledge4israel.com/]. According to the Web site, over 1,200 students have already pledged to donate that amount since the project was created in April. That number should rise thanks to the assistance of Hillel, the World Union of Jewish Students and the CAJE, the Coalition for the Advancement of Jewish Education.

There are many organizations that will take contributions for Israel, including the United Jewish Appeal's (UJA) Israel Emergency Campaign [http://www.uja.org/] or your local federation [http://jewishfinder.com]. Israel's Magen David Adom welcomes all contributions and will work with organizations or individuals that are interested in donating an ambulance – $54,900 (US) or a mobile intensive care unit $69,900 (US) [http://www.magendavidadom.org/ambulances.html].

Always investigate any charity before donating by mail, phone or through the Internet.

Show a soldier you care: You can send your wishes by e-mail to an Israeli soldier at LetterToSoldier@jazo.org.il. If you prefer to mail a letter or send a fax, you'll find the address at this page [http://www.bjeny.org/287.html].

In April, Israeli Shimon Aharon came up with a unique way to help boost the morale of the country's soldiers. Aharon set up PizzaIDF where anyone in the world could donate money to have pizza and cola delivered to Israeli soldiers [http://www.pizzaidf.org/]. Since then, 4,000 pizzas have been delivered to army bases, foot patrols and army checkpoints. The idea of delivering treats to soldiers came after years of successfully sending them Mishloach Manot on Purim [http://israelvisit.co.il/MM/].

Unfortunately in these tense times, even the best intentions can raise concerns over security. The army has decided to bar soldiers from accepting pizzas that they did not order. They are concerned "that hostile elements may exploit the pizza deliveries to soldiers" [http://shlk.com/79]. But even if you can't order a pizza, you still can send those soldiers a care package of goodies [http://www.dashcham.com/idf.html].

Visit Israel: There are many solidarity missions and tours scheduled for the summer months. The Israel Ministry of Tourism's Go Israel Web site specializes in finding the right Israeli tour for North Americans [http://www.goisrael.com/]. The UJA's travel page has more information plus some very emotional memoirs written by recent visitors to Israel [http://www.uja.org/travel_home.html].

If want to try a trip to Israel with a difference, consider becoming a volunteer on a kibbutz, for the Magen David Adom or to work with children and adults with special needs [http://www.jafi.org.il/daily/vol.asp].

The students of Yeshiva University have been very busy. Despite the downturn in Israel's tourism industry, 200 YU students travelled to Israel in January as part of Operation Torah Shield [http://www.torahshield.com/main.html]. While there, they met with families who have lost loved ones to terror. And when the students returned to America, they created the Kol Haneshama (Every Soul) Web site to tell the stories of "these ordinary people, whose extraordinary lives ended so abruptly."

While there, they met with the friends and family of Keren Shatsky, 14, who was killed in a mall bombing in the town of Karnei Shomron on February 16. "'All of my memories of Keren are of her smiling,' said Chani Friedman, a close friend. Together with her siblings, Keren sang to their favourite songs and regularly prepared meals for Shabbat. When her friends felt ill, Keren sent cards with sweet wishes for a full recovery. 'She was always trying to make people happy,' noted one family friend. 'That just reflects how much everyone loved her. She was only trying to return the love.'" [http://www.kolhaneshama.net]

Holy Blossom sends medical delegation to FSU

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

On a recent trip to the former Soviet Union, a group of physicians, all members of Holy Blossom Temple, demonstrated the difference between treatment and healing.

Rabbi Yael Splansky, associate rabbi at Holy Blossom, who accompanied the delegation on the 10-day trip, said that although the doctors did not actively treat the patients who lived in Minsk and nearby towns, "by speaking with them one-on-one, they were able to help in the healing process."

The delegation – Holy Blossom's first with a medical focus – included Barbara Organ, a neonatal nurse; Ted Rosenstock, an ophthalmologist; Earl Silverman, a pediatric rheumatologist; Marvin Ganz, a pediatrician; and Stuart Egier, Randi Shaul and Rhonda Wilansky, all family physicians.

The doctors took with them thousands of dollars of medical supplies donated by such firms as Apotex, Novopharm and the Canadian Medical Aid Program. Six boxes of medicines were prepared by Health Partners International.

They distributed some over-the-counter medicines directly to patients, and gave prescription drugs to local doctors for distribution.

As well as meeting with patients, Wilansky, who is also a mohel, met with the only Reform mohel in the former Soviet Union, and made future plans to gather doctors and lay leaders to train them in the ceremony and technology of brit milah.

"We found that in the former Soviet Union, brit milah is not on the radar screen. When the Reform rabbi had a baby in Minsk, the mohel had to come from Moscow to perform the circumcision," said Rabbi Splansky.

Training others to perform brit milah, she said, would affect how Jewish lifestyle is observed.

While consulting with patients, said Egier, who is also medical director of specialized geriatric services at Trillium Health Centre, the Toronto physicians discovered that patients "really wanted to connect with Canadian doctors. We encouraged people to take their medicines, to make appropriate lifestyle changes, and to follow-up on their own doctors' recommendations."

Soviet doctors take a paternalistic attitude towards medicine, Egier said. "They rush people through examinations and they do not talk to them enough."

The Toronto doctors were disturbed, he said, to discover that many patients took their medications, such as heart medicine, only when they felt unwell. "I believe we made a difference."

Rabbi Splansky said Soviet doctors routinely withhold information from their patients. "The patients came to see us with sealed envelopes. They did not know what is in their file."

Dr. Ted Rosenstock, part of Holy Blossom's delegation to the former Soviet Union, examines a patient.

The Toronto doctors knew that what they were doing for the patients was only a "band-aid" solution, Rabbi Splansky said, but just coming and listening to them was a big help. "It was Jew to Jew, and real doctor-to-patient care. Sometimes, just telling them they're OK makes a big difference. That is something they do not get there."

Wilansky, who travelled with an interpreter to nearby Tsimikovici, a town where her ancestors lived, said the town was typical of an eastern European shtetl, except there is no longer any Jewish life.

"The trip was very emotional. There were no monuments or plaques commemorating the Jews – no remnants of the rich Jewish life that used to exist there."

She is committed to a project to commemorate Jewish life in Tsimikovici. "There are still about one million Jews living in [the former Soviet Union] and we need to help [develop] their Judaism, but we also need to commemorate the rich Jewish life that existed before."

Rabbi Splansky said a number of people are interested in joining the delegation next year. "What we want next time is to add an educational component. We can reach more people if we do patient and physician education. We could hold seminars on such things as hypertension, and help doctors and patients understand what steps to take."

Now that they have made a connection with the physician community in Minsk, said Egier, the Toronto doctors hope to bring their expertise to them.

The big breakthrough on this trip, Wilansky said, was making connections and ascertaining where certain needs lie. "I can't wait to go back. I have a personal connection to the area, and the people appreciated us coming. They felt good that Jewish doctors cared about them."

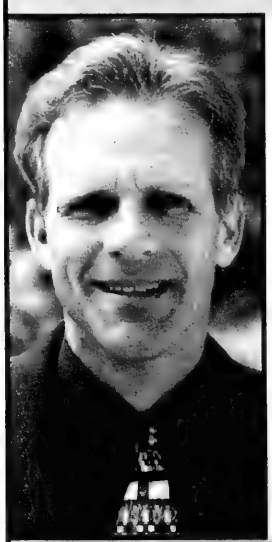
Six Days of War:
June 1967 and the Making of the Modern Middle East



Michael Oren
Mon. June 17, 2002, at 8 p.m.

With its swift and stunning military victory against an Arab coalition led by Egypt in the Six Day War, Israel preserved its existence and redrew the map of the region — with fateful consequences.

The Camp David Accords, the assassinations of Anwar Sadat and Yitzhak Rabin, the first intifada, the failed Oslo Accord and the current crisis, all trace their origins to the Six Day War.

Michael Oren, a Princeton-trained scholar in Middle East history, Senior Fellow at The Shalem Center in Jerusalem and former advisor to the Israeli delegation to the United Nations, will give a gripping account of one of the pivotal events in modern Middle Eastern history.

Jews need to change view of Poles: survivor

By BEN ROSE
Special to CJN

The Polish people have been undeservedly accused of anti-Semitism during the war years and after and it is time to change this attitude, Auschwitz survivor Nate Leipciger told a recent meeting of the Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation.

He spoke at the annual Louis Lenkinski lecture at the Workmen's Circle in memory of the trade unionist and Jewish activist who died seven years ago.

Leipciger, a past chair of the Canadian Jewish Congress Holocaust remembrance committee and a board member of the International Council for Auschwitz, said that he swore he would never go back to Poland after a visit to Auschwitz in 1975, although he later changed his mind.

After his 1975 trip, he was angered at the lack of recognition for the Jews who died there, and by the fact a cross was used in the main memorial.

These problems have since been fixed, Leipciger said, and he spoke of the "friendly reception" he got from Poles when he visited Poland in 1992 for the dedication of a memorial to the Warsaw Ghetto uprising.

"It is now time for Jewish people to be educated about Auschwitz," he said, in a speech titled Changing Attitudes of a Survivor Toward Auschwitz and Poland.

He said his talk could be summed up as "Auschwitz then, and Auschwitz now."

Leipciger said many survivors do not give enough emphasis to the fact that 80,000 Christian Poles died at Auschwitz. "Half the names gathered by Yad Vashem are of Righteous Gentiles," he said.

Although he and his companions were taunted by an anti-Semite during his 1992 visit, Leipciger said the anti-Semite was silenced by other Poles and there were no other incidents during the trip.

Leipciger said part of the Auschwitz site is now an educational centre, and noted that the centre recently hosted more than 400 student teachers for a two-week workshop on the Holocaust. "The seminars are oversubscribed," he said.

He added that he is confident the Polish government will solve the problem posed by a proposed shopping centre to be attached to the camp's main wall, which survivors have called inappropriate.

In the meantime, he said, many things have already been done to improve conditions at Auschwitz, including the relocation of a Carmelite convent at the perimeter of the camp and the dedication of memorial plaques in 18 languages indicating that many Jews died there.

His assertions were challenged by some of the 50 people in attendance, some of whom spoke to Leipciger after his speech and maintained that the Polish people were anti-Semitic.

Leipciger also described his family's hardships when the Germans attacked Poland. At age 11, he said, he became the head male of his household after his father was taken for a German work gang.

Leipciger said he later survived Auschwitz because of the skills he learned as a member of a "gang" on the streets of his home town, a village near the German border. As anti-Jewish measures increased in the late 1930s, the gang would have nothing more to do with him and he lost more and more of his non-Jewish friends.

In his talk, Leipciger also debunked some common perceptions about Jews in Poland before World War II.

He noted that 32,000 Jews died serving in the Polish army, and that the image of the "shtetl Jew" in prewar Poland was misleading, since most Polish Jews lived in large and small cities.

BGU, Mount Sinai to honour doctor

On Sept. 18, Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University of the Negev and Mount Sinai Hospital will join forces to honour Dr Zane Cohen.

Guest speaker at the tribute, to be held at the Sheraton Centre, will be Nobel Laureate Elie Wiesel.

Cohen has lectured worldwide and is an international figure in surgery and in the study of colon and rectal disease.

He is entering his third term as surgeon-in-chief at Mount Sinai Hospital, and is also chair of the division of surgery at the University of Toronto.

Cohen has launched a project that is part of the Leadership Sinai Advanced Surgical Technology Centre which allows surgeons at Mount Sinai Hospital to demonstrate skills to professionals worldwide.

Wiesel, one of the most articulate exponents of contemporary Jewish thought, has worked on behalf of oppressed people for much of his adult life.

His personal experience in the Holocaust has led him to use his talents as an author, teacher and storyteller to defend human rights and peace throughout the world.

Dr. Zane Cohen

Ben-Gurion University will present Cohen with the Negev Award, and will create the Zane and Joan Cohen Endowment Scholarship Fund which will provide scholarships and fellowships for individuals working in the area of gastrointestinal disease, both medical and surgical, at Ben-Gurion University.

Funds raised will support Cohen's work by helping to create a new and vital surgical same day admitting unit at Mount Sinai Hospital.

She'arim to honour two leaders

By ADAM GRACHNIK
CJN Intern

Two prominent members of the Jewish community are being honoured for their outstanding contributions to Jewish education.

Sandy Brown and Gerry Goldberg are being honoured at the Dr. Abraham Shore She'arim Hebrew Day School annual tribute brunch June 16.

"We want to [recognize] someone who has an impact in some way or form on Jewish education," says Marci Tenenbaum, the event's co-ordinator. "It [the brunch] raises awareness in the community for the school."

Both honorees speak passionately about the school that provides Hebrew education for students with learning disabilities.

"She'arim has always been the best kept secret in the community," says Goldberg. "There are a lot of kids with disabilities. This place is essential for them."

"[It's] the kind of school that you hope would have no students," adds Brown. "It's been a wonderful opportunity to continue the Jewish education system."

Goldberg has a personal connection to She'arim. His youngest son spent three years at the school, after being diagnosed with Attention Deficit Disorder (ADD) – a disorder that slows down the nervous system and severly hinders a person's – usually a child's – ability to concentrate.

"I believe that it is the right of every child to get a Jewish education, regardless of exceptionality," Goldberg says.

Brown said that she has seen tremendous growth at She'arim over the years.

"We have been able to see students move back to mainstream schools," she says, adding that the school's objective is to return students to regular schools, after spending time at She'arim.

Brown says she learned the importance of volunteering in her hometown.

"It [Saint John, N.B.] is a very small community, everyone counted there. It was the natural thing to get involved," she said about the city, where she was actively involved in the Zionist youth movement Young Judea.

Since then, Brown has held many positions in the community, including national chair of Canadian Jewish Congress' education and culture committee, chair of the UJA Board of Jewish Education of Toronto (BJE) and president of the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Goldberg immigrated from South Africa in 1976, the country where his parents taught him the importance of education.

"Jewish education is very important. It keeps people Jewish," says Goldberg.

He has been active in many organizations, including the board of Associated Hebrew Schools, treasurer of Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), the BJE and president of board of directors of She'arim.

The brunch will be held at the Sephardic Kehilla Centre, 7026 Bathurst St, Thornhill, at 10:30 a.m. For tickets, call Tenenbaum at 416-633-4783.

Jewish locals angry at 'biased' CUPE resolution

last month, came under fire from Jewish locals and from Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) for saying Israel "invaded" territories in 1967, for referring to suicide bombings in a passive voice while omitting references to Palestinian perpetrators, and for urging Ottawa to make demands of Israel but not the Palestinians.

"It's a very biased perspective," said Carolyn Roberts, president of CUPE local 2137, which represents workers at Jewish Vocational Services of Greater Toronto. "I'm uncomfortable with how quickly it happened, with how little consultation there was. No Jewish agency in Toronto was consulted on this."

In a letter to CUPE National President Judy Darcy, Roberts asks "that CUPE National consider the implications, for its members and for the cause of peace in the Middle East, of advancing this resolution in its present form at the [CLC] convention, and that it withdraw its support for the resolution."

In a statement to the CJC, Darcy said that "complex struggles dealing with issues of land, social justice and human rights are not easily reduced to a few words. History cannot always be clearly captured in convention resolutions."

She added that "CUPE supports an independent Canadian foreign policy that respects the rights of all peoples in the Middle East to lasting peace and security" and that Canada should do all it can "to de-escalate the conflict and support the pursuit of peace negotiations that bring all parties to the table and respect the rights of Israelis and Palestinians to security and land."

Roberts, who was recently elected to her post, said she finds it "odd that we have an emergency resolution that was railroaded through."

She said CUPE's protocol for resolutions, which was not followed in this case, requires that they be filed 35 days in advance, adding that potential opponents were unaware the resolution was going to be presented and were not at the conference to dispute it.

JVS workers "were outraged" at its passage, particularly since it seemed to violate CUPE's own "mantra," of " 'Solidarity. An injury to one is an injury to all,' " Roberts said.

"We pay dues to be incensed in this way? That's not why we're in the union. We're interested primarily in workplace issues."

Lil Nobel, president of CUPE local 2063, which represents about 80 workers at Canadian Jewish Congress, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and Jewish Immigrant Aid Services, said her members were also angry at the contents of the resolution, which she called inaccurate and unbalanced, and for the way it was introduced without notice.

Nobel disputed the resolution's claim that Israel "invaded" Arab territories, saying the land came under Israel's control in a defensive war. She also took issue with the resolution's claim that UN Resolution 242 requires a unilateral Israeli withdrawal, saying the UN document specifies that a pullback should only come in the context of a peace agreement.

Moreover, "the slant of it put all the blame on Israel and none on the Palestinians" she added.

"The members are just so hot on this subject," she said.

Despite members' anger, Nobel said local 2063 will not withdraw from CUPE, as had been suggested in earlier media reports.

Doreen Benou, a member of CUPE local 79, which represents public health workers with the City of Toronto, said many Jewish union members she has spoken with are angry the union passed the resolution without prior notice. "Where does this belong on the agenda of workers' issues and working in the workplace?" she asked.

Bonnie Kates, a shop steward with local 79, which is currently negotiating a new contract with the city, said CUPE should avoid political issues.

"I've spoken to three Jewish CUPE members who are disgusted," she said, adding that she is so angry about the resolution that she is reconsidering picketing for the union in the event of a strike.

Gilbert Levine, CUPE's founding national research director and a union member until his retirement in 1988, said the resolution mirrors recent Israeli polls that support the withdrawal of troops from occupied territories. "However, I too was disturbed that the CUPE resolution did not acknowledge the right of every state in the region to live peacefully within secure borders," he said.

"I hope those employees at Jewish agencies that are considering leaving CUPE as a result of this resolution will change their minds. CUPE is open to a variety of points of view. It is important their perspectives are heard in the union."

Early last week, a CJC delegation met with Ryan and other CUPE officials to discuss the issue.

Ed Morgan, chair of Congress' Ontario region, called the meeting productive and said CUPE officials seemed receptive to Congress' views.

The resolution is "problematic in what it says and it's problematic in what it leaves out," Morgan said.

Adopting a combative tone, yet sounding conciliatory on several points, Ryan acknowledged that the use of the word "invaded" in the preamble to the resolution has created concern. "If I had crafted the resolution, I wouldn't have put that word in there," he said.

The aim of the resolution was to promote peace and human rights and to call for Israel to withdraw from occupied territories, Ryan said, noting that even U.S. President George W. Bush has called on Israel to withdraw.

He said emergency resolutions can bypass the rule requiring 35 days advance notice and that the ongoing killings in the Middle East warranted treating the situation as an emergency.

Ryan said critiques of the resolution by Congress verged on "union-busting that is not helpful to their cause."

At the same time, he said the resolution stands little chance of being adopted as it now stands at this week's CLC meeting. The CUPE resolution will likely be only one of several views that will be expressed on the Mideast situation, and "I suspect they'll come up with a composite resolution."

Web-zine caters to students

By ADAM GRACHNIK
CJN Intern

Imagine owning an online magazine where you are free to write about what you want, when you want and how you want, with a staff of 40 people working for you. Sound like a lifelong dream? For Marilyn Gayle Bromberg, this is one dream that has already come true.

Marilyn Bromberg

Bromberg, 20, is the founder and CEO of www.onthewallnow.com, a weekly web-zine that caters to the university and college crowd. First launched in May 2001, the magazine has had all kinds of off-the-wall content, including articles discussing the truth behind names and why bald men are attractive, articles that criticize the Super Bowl, religious debates and many other wacky, entertaining and thought-provoking articles.

"We provide intelligent, relevant and cheese-free reading," Bromberg says. "They are things you're thinking but now reading. Normally, we can connect with any visitor in some aspect."

The goal of the Web site, while seeking to inform and entertain, is also to provide young people with an outlet to explore their creativity and give them an opportunity to gain valuable experience.

"Other organizations are not as accommodating to students as we are. We have a different standard and are accepting and welcoming to everyone," she says of her Web site, which she created after attending the Achieving Professional Excellence Conference in Toronto – an annual student conference that caters to business students.

"We're trying to form a new kind of media that is not afraid for doing taboo subjects or to stick up for the underdog," she says.

The third year Schulich School of Business undergraduate is no media industry virgin. She has had articles published in The Toronto Star, The York Region Liberal, as well as the Excalibur, York University's campus newspaper, and was the editor of the life section for the Shulich School of Business' paper, The Insider.

"Now I can write a lot more than can get published in another publication," she says about one of the major benefits of onthe wallnow.com.

Bromberg, who graduated from Associated Hebrew Day Schools and spent time at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), is a self-proclaimed fashion buff who loves dancing, rollerblading and playing squash.

She also volunteers with the Reena Foundation and is the assistant director of Youth Fighting Tobacco ads and is currently developing a television show with Matrix Produxions that's set to air in September. Without revealing many details, she says the show will be about universities and have a current affairs/investigative format.

When asked about how she juggles all her activities, she says, "It is all about time management and delegation. I can't do it all myself. But I have great people behind me and really capable editors."

Yet, she says, "I am an extremely independent person."

With one eye focused on her current projects, this gifted young media mogul is setting her sights on the future. She plans to graduate from Schulich and then enter law school.

"I am not going to lie to you and say I am not ambitious," she says with a laugh.

"I want to write a novel, maybe win a Pulitzer."

Bromberg has a message for other young people beginning their careers.

"Just because [someone is] young doesn't mean that they don't have anything to offer the workforce," she says.

Onthewallnow.com is always looking for new volunteers. If you are interested in getting involved, contact Bromberg at mgbromberg@onthewallnow.com.

SENIOR COMPLETES STUDIES: Dolly Sherman, 92, receives a diploma for graduating from an adult education program organized by the institution's executive director Barbra Gold for residents of Maimonides Hospital Geriatric Centre and its foster homes. Invest more in immigrants, Grow Winnipeg chair says

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Bob Silver, the new co-owner of the Winnipeg Free Press and founder of a provincial program to attract immigrants, has been chosen to lead community efforts to increase Winnipeg's Jewish population.

Bob Silver

The Jewish Federation of Winnipeg/Combined Jewish Appeal established the Grow Winnipeg committee in April to address the issue of the city's declining Jewish population, which now stands at about 14,000 as compared to about 19,000 at its peak 40 years ago. The initiative was one of several recommendations made in a study released last October.

The committee's goal is to increase the Jewish population here to 18,000 by the end of the decade, says Silver.

"[The Jewish] population is lower than it used to be and, if we don't do something, it is going to continue to decline," he says. "Our birthrate is not keeping up with emigration. If we keep on going down this path, we will eventually no longer be able to support the amenities that we have come to count on."

Silver, who is also the president of Western Glove Works, one of Canada's major jeans manufacturers, brought immigrants into the province through a joint federal/provincial plan called the Manitoban Nominee Program, which he helped start four years ago while president of the Manitoba Fashion Institute.

"Initially, Manitoba was allowed to bring in 100 sewing machine operators for our garment industry," Silver says. "Now, under the program, Manitoba can bring in 1,000 immigrant families a year. We believe if we get there and talk properly with Ottawa, the federal government will let us increase that number."

Silver, a canvasser for the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg/CJA for the last five years, agreed to chair his first committee because, he says, its mandate resonated with what he is trying to accomplish in the garment industry.

The demographic problems facing Winnipeg's Jewish community are a microcosm of the problem that the province of Manitoba has as a whole in attracting and retaining people, he says.

The eight-member committee has three sub-committees, which deal with immigration, retention and renewal, respectively. Silver says of the three, immigration is the easiest issue to deal with because the provincial government is very supportive and there are large numbers of Argentinian Jewish families who want to come here. Winnipeg has also seen a steady stream of Russian Jewish immigrants, he says.

"The biggest problem in dealing with immigration is settlement," Silver says. "We still need to develop the infrastructure to ensure that there are jobs for the immigrants and that we are a welcoming community. We are not as structured as we should be yet. I have told the community leadership that we as a community have to be prepared to invest a lot more money and effort for education and recreation for immigrant children."

As to retention, Silver notes that the exodus of young people from the province has slowed both in the general and Jewish community in recent years, but they are still leaving. Efforts to encourage young people to remain have been on an ad hoc basis, he says.

"I don't think that we as a community do enough to sell young people on the benefits of staying here or returning after they have left. We are often our own worst critics and enemies. Some people seem almost embarrassed to be Manitobans."

He notes that most young people leave Winnipeg to pursue better financial opportunities elsewhere or because they are seeking a better quality of life. Young Jews who have either grown up Orthodox or have become Orthodox move because of their concerns about Jewish education and kashrut. (Winnipeg's Vaad Ha'ir is working to raise the standard of kashrut in the city.)

> 'Need to sell young people on benefits of staying here'

"Toronto is able to offer people a large Orthodox community in which they can feel comfortable," he says. "Winnipeg doesn't have that critical mass."

The media has a role to play in promoting a sense of pride in community, Silver says.

He and longtime business partner Ron Stern (a former Winnipegger who now lives in Vancouver) bought the Free Press, Winnipeg's leading daily paper, and the Brandon Sun from the Thomson family last December.

"It has been a lot of fun owning a newspaper," Silver says, "although it has brought me more attention than I bargained for."

As they gain more experience, he says, he and Stern intend to adopt a more hands-on approach to the paper than the previous owners while at the same time trying not to interfere too much with the paper's management.

HEARD THE LATEST...?

Hearing Solutions Toronto's largest provider of hearing healthcare, is proud to have been recognized as the Best Hearing Clinic in Toronto by Forever Young magazine and the Etobicoke Guardian, and most recently by the prestigious Consumer's Choice Awards.

Hearing Solutions has recently opened at The Promenade Shopping Centre and at St. Clair and Avenue Road. With these two new clinics, including their North York Clinic at Lawrence and Dufferin, Hearing Solutions now has convenient clinics for the Toronto Jewish community from north to south.

The full-service clinics provide for all needs under one roof. Unlike going to a doctor's office or visiting a hearing aid retailer, Hearing Solutions is equipped and staffed to allow clients to have their hearing tested at the same place they purchase their hearing aid. In addition to state-of-the-art equipment and the latest technologies in hearing aids, Hearing Solutions staff includes Registered Dispensing Audiologists and Hearing Instrument Practitioners.

Clients are seen by one of their highly qualified Audiologists, like Simon Lai and Marilyn Pike. Before joining Hearing Solutions Simon was the Director of Audiology at Baycrest Hospital, and Marilyn was Director of Audiology and Speech Pathology at the Canadian Hearing Society.

The staff at Hearing Solutions involve their clients throughout the entire process of testing and hearing aid evaluation. Clients are educated about their degree of hearing loss and their options, so they can make informed decisions.

A personal approach has made Hearing Solutions very popular in the Jewish Community in the Lawrence area. Many happy customers have recommended their service to friends and family. Now, with expanded locations, it's even easier to enjoy the sounds of life again.

Coast to Coast

CBC and Israel, part 2

Israel is an open society – the media can go there, do what they please, report as they please.
– Bernard Lewis, CBC Radio, Ideas, June 3, 2002.

To listen to Neil Macdonald talking about freedom of the press in Israel, one would not have recognized the country described by Bernard Lewis. During a question period at a CBC Foreign Correspondents Forum held recently in Ottawa, Macdonald was asked whether his broadcasts must be approved in advance by Israel, and how this might affect his reports.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Macdonald's response: "I and every other member of the foreign press corps in Israel sign a form submitting to the official censor, and they exercise it at their discretion, and often there's no rhyme or reason to it. The Israelis have a whole range of instruments, like most governments do, to tamp down on reporting they don't want or to suppress facts they don't want to see put out in the open. But they are by no means unique in the region."

Macdonald was very misleading. He clearly implied that his reports are generally subject to the whim of the official Israeli censor to prevent unpalatable "facts" from being broadcast to the outside world. That is simply not so. Nor does Israel operate like its neighbours, as Macdonald implied, who clamp down on reporters as a matter of official policy. Macdonald wrongly suggested a difference of degree, not of kind.

Journalists have virtually unrestricted freedom to report as they wish from Israel, in stark contrast to the surrounding Arab states and the Palestinian Authority. This freedom makes Israel home to one of the largest bodies of foreign correspondents in the world. Too often, however, instead of redounding to its credit, such journalistic autonomy is used as a convenient tool for excessively one-sided reporting. In short, Israel becomes a victim of its own openness as the sole democracy in a sea of autocracies and dictatorships.

The facts that Macdonald should have explained are the following: while foreign correspondents are required to sign a censorship form, this procedure applies only to militarily-sensitive matters and not to general reporting. Governed by the rule of law, Israel cannot officially repress reporting.

According to the Government Press Office which handles the censorship forms, no foreign correspondent, including Macdonald, has had any material censored during the past year.

One veteran Israeli correspondent put it this way: "It's true everyone signs the form, and then everyone ignores it, as all journalists in this country well know."

So what is subject to censorship? During the 1991 Gulf War, journalists were required not to reveal where Iraqi Scuds had landed as this was militarily-sensitive information.

During Operation Solomon in May 1991 to rescue Ethiopian Jews, the media were asked not to report the airlift until it was over to avoid jeopardizing its success.

Reporters are also asked not to report personal details of casualties before families are informed.

Apart from rare instances like these, the press in Israel is completely free – a remarkable fact for a country that has never known peace.

Hamilton holds Walk for Israel

By JULIA KOLLEK
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — About 250 joggers, bikers and pedestrians of all ages turned out for Hamilton's annual 7-kilometre walk on June 2, which this year raised $20,000 towards the community's fourth ambulance to be sent to Israel.

This is a separate project from the Emergency Fund for Israel to which the community is also contributing. More than half of the approximately $80,000 needed for the Magen David Adom ambulance has already been raised by a fund-raising team led by Hilda Rosen. Rosen was thrilled when the St. Catharine's Jewish community offered to join fund-raising efforts.

Joggers led the way at Hamilton's recent Walk for Israel.

Several organizations worked together on the Sunday morning walk, to provide premises, staff and volunteers, and Hamilton's UJA has pledged to add additional funds if necessary.

Where the generations meet

It all happens at the Bernard Betel Centre

Jean Diamond with Grade 13 students involved in the inter-generational program.

Monica Kastelic, a Grade 13 Newtonbrook student, sat across the table from Jean Diamond, an active senior citizen and member of the Bernard Betel Centre.

That day, they were of similar mind and interests, both eager participants in an all day inter-generational workshop entitled "Relationships."

Jean shared stories about the past and her own views about life, but what surprised and encouraged Monica most was Jean's sincere interest listening without judgment to the teenage girl's dream.

Jean conveyed the strong message that one must not hesitate to pursue dreams. Her own had been shut down during the Holocaust.

The day was part of an ongoing program bringing together seniors and youth from elementary to university levels, from public and Jewish schools.

The students interviewed the seniors to learn about their lifestyles and backgrounds. They later reported they'd learned important lessons about life.

Monica saw Jean's face glow as she shared her late husband's quote: "It is better to look out a window than into a mirror. In the mirror you only see yourself, while out of a window you see people in need, and help others help themselves."

Jean had endured many hardships; the most significant was the loss of her loving husband of 47 years. "Being alone is most difficult," acknowledged Jean. "It is logic that helps me overcome negative emotions."

Jean told how she cherishes the special relationship she has with her devoted children and grandchildren. "Not only do I feel that they believe in me, I love it when my granddaughter refers to me as her mentor."

Monica was greatly impressed with Jean's energy, inner strength and desire to be active and independent.

The Bernard Betel Centre's workshop focused on the similarities as well as the differences between the generations.

The young students learned that many of the same issues affect older people as well as younger ones, though in different ways -- peer pressure, mate selection, and community involvement.

And Monica learned from her new friend Jean how crucial it is to a senior's well-being to have a place to go to meet people for activities, friendship, continued learning, and for sharing experiences and acquired wisdom with others.

Israel unimpressed by Palestinian reforms

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The Palestinian Authority (PA) has unveiled some promised reforms, but terror attacks against Israelis continue unabated.

Three Israelis were killed and nine others wounded in Palestinian shooting attacks on two West Bank communities over the weekend.

In the Gaza Strip, an attack was thwarted by Israeli troops who spotted two armed Palestinians swimming toward shore.

With this as a backdrop, Israeli officials were not impressed Sunday when the PA announced some changes.

With PA Chairman Yasser Arafat under internal and international pressure to implement reforms, Information Minister Yasser Abed Rabbo announced Sunday that the cabinet would be reduced from 31 to 21 ministers.

Rabbo also announced the appointment of an interior minister, Abdel Razak Yehiyeh, to oversee Palestinian security services. Arafat had kept the title for himself since the PA was created in 1994.

Responding to the announcement, Dore Gold, a senior adviser to Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, said: "If we see fundamental change in the behavior of the Palestinian security forces in which they intercept the attacks against Israel and not collaborate with them, we'll know that something big has occurred."

Sharon, who is meeting this week with U.S. President George W. Bush at the White House, has said repeatedly there can be no meaningful Palestinian reforms as long as Arafat remains in power.

Sharon gave an indication of what he plans to tell Bush in an op-ed piece that appeared in Sunday's New York Times, where he reiterated his position that Palestinian violence must stop before there can be negotiations.

"Israel has made painful concessions for peace before and will demonstrate diplomatic flexibility to make peace again, but it requires first and foremost a reliable partner for peace," Sharon wrote.

Blaming the failure of previous talks with the Palestinians on the wide gaps between the sides, Sharon advocated a long-term interim agreement and ruled out a return to the pre-1967 borders.

"The only serious option for a successful negotiated settlement is one based on a long-term interim agreement that sets aside for the future issues that cannot be bridged at present," he wrote.

"For this reason, Israel will not return to the vulnerable 1967 armistice lines, re-divide Jerusalem or concede its right to defensible borders under [United Nations] Resolution 242.

"Movement from a long-term interim agreement to a permanent settlement can only be guided by changes in the reality of Israeli-Palestinian relations on the ground and not by a rigid timetable."

Israeli commentators speculated that Sharon would find a receptive audience in Bush, who reiterated over the weekend that Arafat has failed the Palestinian people.

Bush also refused to set a timetable for the creation of a Palestinian state.

After meeting with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, who had sought such a timetable, Bush said the United States is "not ready to lay down a specific calendar" for the creation of a Palestinian state, but added that the two sides have to resume negotiations "quickly, so we can seize the moment."

Bush also said that before a timetable could be set, the Palestinians need to build "the institutions necessary for the emergence of a Palestinian state."

For his part, Mubarak said he does not "think that violence will come to an end unless the people feel that there is hope for peace and there is something to show that peace is coming."

Bush said last Friday he would speak about the next steps toward Middle East peace after the separate meetings with Mubarak and Sharon. Meanwhile, the deadly Palestinian terror attacks continued, with three Israelis shot and nine wounded in shooting attacks in the West Bank communities of Karmei Tzur and Yitzhar.

Israel reportedly set to free jailed Hezbollah man

By DANIEL SOBELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The father of an IDF soldier missing for 18 months said Monday that Israel was about to release a Hezbollah militant jailed since 1987, in a bid to work toward a possible exchange of prisoners with the pro-Iranian organization.

"Today or tomorrow, Israel will return to the Lebanese a Hezbollah prisoner of war whose health is apparently compromised, in order to create the right climate for ending the affair of our sons and of [kidnapped former IDF colonel] Elhanan Tannenbaum," Haim Avraham told Israel Radio on Monday.

Avraham's son Benny was kidnapped by Hezbollah guerrillas in October 2000, while patrolling the border along Lebanon with two other IDF soldiers – Adi Avitan and Omar Souad. Israeli authorities subsequently informed the families that forensic experts had reached the conclusion that the three were no longer alive.

"Authorized officials of the defence establishment have been in contact with us and told us that Israel was about to make its third gesture toward Lebanon," Avraham said. "The first time, Israel released a number of Lebanese prisoners in November 2000. Afterward, last year, Israel returned the body of the Lebanese pilot who reached Israel and was shot down over [the coastal village of] Michmoret."

Avraham said he expected Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to raise the issue during his current talks with senior American officials in Washington.

Beirut's As-Safira newspaper, viewed as close to the Hezbollah organization, reported Monday that Israel was about to free Mohamad al-Barzawi, captured during a Hezbollah attack on an Israeli position in the Chouf mountains in 1987.

"Freeing the prisoner al-Barzawi is considered the first actual signal toward renewal of negotiations between Hezbollah and the Israelis surrounding the exchange of prisoners between the two sides," the paper wrote in a front-page story.

It said the reported release was brokered by a German mediator who had held talks in Israel and Lebanon.

Al-Barzawi is said to be suffering from serious health problems. The paper said a Hezbollah representative had told his family of the imminent release Saturday, and that welcoming celebrations were planned in the family town of Baalbek.

He has been kept in administrative detention since his capture during a Hezbollah operation on Dec. 4, 1987, during which two of the group's guerrillas were killed.

Asked about the reported deal, IDF spokesperson Ron Kitrey said he had no knowledge of it, but added that he "wanted to hope, for the sake of the members of the families of the missing and captured, that this is… perhaps a positive sign."

Israel convinces Europeans Arafat is financing terror

By YAIR ETTINGER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The European Commission has accepted Israel's claims that the Palestinian Authority is supporting terrorist attacks, but is rejecting Israel's demands that it suspend financial aid to the PA, saying Israel has failed to prove that European Union funds are being used to finance terror.

The documents seized from PA offices in recent months, some of which were included in the document compiled by minister without portfolio Dan Naveh following Operation Defensive Shield, were presented last week to an EC delegation in Israel and representatives of the International Monetary Fund (IMF) at a meeting with Israeli army intelligence officers.

Naveh claims the documents prove European financial aid has been used to finance terrorism and incitement, and has also found its way into the pockets of senior PA officials.

But the head of the EC's delegation to Israel, Giancarlo Chevallard, said that Israel had not provided evidence that European financial aid is being used to finance terrorist attacks.

Meanwhile, a report published last week by the German weekly Die Zeit titled Arafat Bombs, Europe Pays claimed the PA is using European aid to finance terrorist attacks.

The European parliament's budgetary committee last week delayed the transfer of 18.7 million euros in financial aid to the PA until the EC reports how the money is to be distributed.

EC external relations commissioner Chris Patten and the EC's budget commissioner, Michaele Schreyer, are scheduled to address the committee on the matter on June 19.

The EU is the PA's largest donor, providing about one-tenth of the PA's annual budget. EU aid to the PA totals around 10 million euros a month, which is meant to finance salaries for teachers, health officials and PA police.

German media found guilty of anti-Israel bias

By TOBY AXELROD
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BERLIN — A vengeful God. An eye for an eye. Israelis as Nazis.

Such themes are common in German reporting about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, according to a new study by the Berlin office of the American Jewish Committee. The themes are dangerous, the study suggests, because they perpetuate stereotypes that promote anti-Semitism.

The study, Mideast Reporting on the Second Intifada in German Print Media, written by Siegfried Jager of the Duisburg Institute for Linguistics and Social Research, concludes that "there is often distortion in the image of Israel, a lack of context and an aggressive tone" in Germany's Middle East reportage, said Deidre Berger, director of the AJCommittee's Berlin office.

The study could provide the basis for a "dialogue on the subject in Germany," she said, adding she hopes members of the media will "take this further."

Even before the study's release, one major German paper was seeking to hire a German-speaking journalist living in Israel to balance its coverage.

"I told the editors that we need to hear the views of people living in Israel," said a staff writer who asked to remain anonymous. "The editor said he would like that, but he did not know anyone there who could do it."

Finding good journalists is only part of the solution. Getting rid of stereotypes is another, more difficult task, observers say.

Take, for example, a recent edition of the news magazine Der Spiegel. On April 8, shortly after a suicide bomber killed 29 Israelis at a Passover seder, the magazine wrote that the Passover holiday "recalls the Exodus and at the same time the killing of the first-born Egyptian sons, destroyed by an angry Jehovah so that His People could leave – the first Passover massacre."

And in the Frankfurter Rundschau of Dec. 3, 2001, Israelis are described in terms clearly linked to the Nazi genocide: Israel is pursuing "liquidation politics" against the Palestinians, the paper reported.

Observers say the outlook for change is not hopeful.

Working under deadline pressure and without a firm foundation in history, they say, journalists will likely continue to reach for the nearest descriptive tools – the simplest metaphors, the oldest stereotypes, images that resonate with religious authority, and in Germany, comparisons with Nazi Germany that have the ultimate function of relativizing German guilt.

It is easy for German reporters to fall into that trap, said Richard Chaim Schneider, a Jewish journalist based in Munich and Israel. "In order to describe certain phenomena in Israel, they very often use expressions in German which come from Nazi terminology," he said.

For example, in German, the expression "all Israel" becomes "gross Israel," which "automatically has a Nazi interpretation, because the term 'gross Deutschland' is associated with the Nazi policy of deportation, conquest and genocide," he said.

"When the Israelis take Palestinians to camps, not to prisons, these are described in German as 'concentration camps,'" Schneider added. "When you use the word" in Germany today, it creates images "of Auschwitz and Dachau and Treblinka."

The AJCommittee study, undertaken by the Duisburg Institute for Linguistics and Social Research, examined German reporting on four incidents:

- the visit by then-opposition leader Ariel Sharon to the Temple Mount on Sept. 28, 2000;
- the widely reported death of a 12-year-old boy, Mohammad al-Darrah, who died in his father's arms when they were caught in the middle of an Israeli-Palestinian gun battle in the Gaza Strip on Sept. 30, 2000;
- the lynching of two Israeli reservists by a Palestinian mob in Ramallah on Oct. 12, 2000; and
- the June 1, 2001, suicide bombing at a Tel Aviv disco.

The study found instances of "racist anti-Semitism," abuse of the Holocaust, anti-Semitic fantasies of blood libels and Jews as child-murderers, and Zionist conspiracy theories.

The study also found anti-Islamic stereotypes.

Jager, the report's author, said at a news conference last Friday where the study was released, that images of "uneducated" and "uncontrollable masses" of Palestinians fed dangerous stereotypes regarding Muslims living in Germany.

One hazard of conducting such studies is that anti-Semitism can be difficult to pin down, said Christina Spaeti, a Swiss scholar at the University of Fribourg who is evaluating views of Israel in the Swiss left-wing press.

Many examples cited in the AJCommittee report are "very strong, pertinent and true," said Spaeti, who had read a short version of the report.

But other examples, she added, are subject to debate.

For example, she believes not all experts on anti-Semitism would agree that calling Jewish settlers "fearful of attacks" was tapping into stereotypes of Jewish cowardliness.

"I think it is very important not to dismiss their argument" that this should be included, Spaeti said. "We do have to be aware that such terms as 'fearful' might resonate in some anti-Semite's head. But then anything might, I fear."

MANY AWARDS CELEBRATE THE ACHIEVEMENTS OF THE PAST.

THIS ONE RECOGNIZES LEADERS OF THE FUTURE.

THE CHARLES BRONFMAN PRIZE

The Charles Bronfman Prize celebrates the vision and talent of individuals whose accomplishments improve the Jewish world. Created by Mr. Bronfman's children in honor of his 70th birthday, The Prize honors those under 50 years of age who, through the excellence of their achievements, have distinguished themselves as cultural leaders.

Each year, an award of $100,000 will be presented to a person or team to acknowledge the best in science and the arts, in literature and scholarship, or in humanitarian efforts. Recipients will be chosen by an international panel of judges and may be of any nationality, religion or culture. Their endeavors will be emblematic of Jewish values and their work will serve to inspire the emerging generation of the Jewish people.

For more than half a century, Charles Bronfman has worked tirelessly as an international business leader and philanthropist. But his overriding passion is sustaining and creating Jewish life in a changing world. It is this quality that The Prize seeks to encourage in emerging leaders.

The Charles Bronfman Prize will be a meaningful tribute for the innovators, heroes and leaders who revolutionize our society, and leave an indelible impression on all our lives.

Mubarak's Palestinian vision

By ZVI BAR'EL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Analysis

Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak's statement last week about Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat's abilities and future crossed a line that has never before been crossed.

In an interview with the New York Times, Mubarak said that as long as the Israeli-Palestinian conflict was in the hands of Arafat and Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, it was difficult to see any solution without active involvement by the United States. Mubarak added that it was possible Arafat would name himself symbolic president about a year after a Palestinian state was declared.

Mubarak is not known for mincing words, and he's been even blunter in the past about other Arab leaders – including Iraq's Saddam Hussein, Libya's Moammar Gadhafi, and the president of Sudan. But such a clear statement about Arafat, in public, has yet to be heard from him.

Arafat managed to anger Mubarak recently on two main issues – the continuing procrastination on reforms to the PA's security mechanisms and Arafat's proposal to bring Hamas and Islamic Jihad into a new government that Arafat plans to appoint.

Mubarak understood from his intelligence chief, Omar Suleiman, who visited Arafat last week and proposed a detailed Egyptian plan for reforms, that at this stage, Arafat either doesn't intend to, or doesn't want to, adopt the Egyptian proposal in its entirety. According to an Egyptian source, "the impression is that Arafat is ready for cosmetic changes and to make them a condition for a change in Israeli policy."

The second issue, even more serious in Mubarak's eyes, is that just as Egypt and Saudi Arabia have been making efforts to persuade the American administration to distinguish between the Palestinian Authority and terror groups – thus enabling a new distinction between legitimate resistance to the occupation and illegitimate terror attacks – Arafat has pulled the rug out from under them by trying to conduct a political romance with these groups. It is a romance, by the way, that has failed, because both Hamas and Islamic Jihad have announced that they will not join Arafat's cabinet.

With his statements, Mubarak has set new parameters for the political discourse that will be acceptable in the Arab world.

And these parameters jibe with what a White House spokesperson said last week when he hinted that Washington intends to conduct intensive contacts with Palestinians who are not named Arafat.

New fund memoralizes victim of genetic disease

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO – Melissa Ger faced many obstacles in her short life. She was born with 22q deletion syndrome, also known as velo-cardial facial syndrome (22qDS/VCFS), a genetic condition that affects multiple organ systems at all their developmental stages.

Melissa had epilepsy, scoliosis, poor muscle tone, speech and language difficulties and learning problems, to name but a few of the medical challenges she experienced on a daily basis.

But she did not give in to her problems, says her mother, Linda Ger Walters. "She was an incredibly tenacious person. She was an inspiration to so many people."

Ger Walters recounted how her daughter was determined to become a bat mitzvah. "It took her a year to learn her portion. She was nervous. But she got up there and she carried her own. It was another test in her life."

Melissa died suddenly in March 2001, just after her 18th birthday, from complications from a minor medical procedure. In her memory, Ger Walters is launching the Lissy Fund to support families and further research related to 22qDS/VCFS.

Its first fund-raiser will be a silent auction at 7:30 p.m on June 17 at Acceso's, 398 Eglinton Ave. W.

"For us, this is launching the initiative to create some meaning for Melissa's life. It was her vision that more people would understand her condition," says Ger Walters.

"This is a way to respect and honour her. It's taking something sad and tragic and making something positive. This is the epitome of who Melissa was."

According to the U.S. National Institute of Health, VCFS is the most common syndrome associated with a cleft palate. It was not recognized until 1978, when Dr. Robert Shprintzen of the Center for Craniofacial Disorders at the Montefiore Medical Center in New York City described 12 children with the disorder, which is also known as Shprintzen syndrome, DiGeorge syndrome, craniofacial syndrome or conotruncal anomaly unusual face syndrome.

The Lissy Fund will be administered by the Hospital for Sick Children (HSC), where Melissa was first diagnosed. In fact, she was the first person to be diagnosed with the syndrome at HSC, says Ger Walters.

"VCFS is under-diagnosed, under-researched and not well understood," she says.

Yet, it is now the most common genetic syndrome diagnosed at HSC, affecting approximately one in 2,000 to 4,000 people, she explains.

"It is more common than Huntington's disease and multiple sclerosis."

Ger Walters notes that the symptoms of 22qDS/VCFS can vary from person to person. Some of the more prevalent ones include kidney, cardiac and endocrine problems, learning difficulties, nasal speech and a variety of problems affecting the palate.

Melissa Ger

She stresses that Melissa's condition was not well understood because there has been little research into the disease.

"We recognize that this is a condition that affects many [medical] subspecialties," Ger Walters says, adding that there is a "need for more co-ordination and a more comprehensive clinic to follow people throughout their lives."

HSC and other University of Toronto teaching hospitals are committed to setting up a comprehensive multi-disciplinary clinic for people with 22qDS/VCFS, Ger Walters says. "It was inspired by Melissa."

She says her daughter saw great value in connecting with people and other families affected by 22q. "We were in the process of putting together a national network of families. Melissa, wanted to be part of this network and she had her contribution planned out."

Ger Walters spoke of her daughter's ability to reach out to other people. "She was the most giving person… She would always think about other people."

Through her involvement in Temple Sinai, Melissa became a counsellor at Camp George, a job she cherished. "She took it very seriously. It was important to her that she do whatever it took to make sure that the kids had a good time."

Melissa also had her high school co-op placement at Temple Sinai's nursery school and she was a teaching assistant for its Sunday school kindergarten.

"She was as much a benefit to our synagogue as the synagogue was to her," says Rabbi Michael Dolgin, spiritual leader of Temple Sinai.

YCC camp opens for Russian-Jewish kids

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — By the end of August, when summer camp season winds down, the black flies and "bug" juice at the Harry Bronfman Y Country Camp (YCC) usually become just a memory.

But this year the YCC's gates are staying open. For the first time in its history, the camp in the Laurentian community of St. Huberdeau is extending its season one more week – Aug. 20 to 26 – to accommodate up to 50 Jewish youngsters from the former Soviet Union (FSU) who now reside in Montreal.

Under the name Camp Shalom Aleichem, the YCC site will be used to give the youths aged 11-14 a chance – for a nominal $50 fee – to experience the fun of camping, to learn about Israel and their Jewish heritage and to integrate into the Jewish community.

"We see it as a stepping stone," said Matt Derkson, who will be Shalom Aleichem's director. "In the years to come, we hope they'll look back at it as a great experience."

More information is also available by contacting Derkson at 737-6551, ext. 530.

Emma Richler wins fiction prize at Jewish Book Awards

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Emma Richler's first novel Sister Crazy won the fiction prize last week at the 14th annual Jewish Book Awards in Toronto, so it seemed highly appropriate for CBC radio host Eleanor Wachtel to recall a comic line from Emma's father, the late Mordecai Richler, before reading a passage from her book.

Saying how much she liked prizes and their presentation, Wachtel recalled that Mordecai had once joked that "there was a prize for the most wholesome book published within 200 miles of Edmonton."

Virginia Woolf once made a similar quip about winning a prize for "tallest women writer of 1927," Wachtel continued, joking that Woolf had won the honour "by a neck."

In truth, however, literary prizes are not nearly so plentiful as these jibes would make it seem. That's why many of the nine prize winners expressed a special gratitude to the 11-member committee behind the awards, which have drawn near-capacity audiences to the Leah Posluns Theatre in recent years.

"I think the awards are a real boost – they help us to keep going," said Toronto writer Cary Fagan, who won the children's literature award for The Market Wedding (Tundra). "I'm personally gratified to the people on the committee who work hard to help make this happen."

Accepting the award for Emma Richler was her brother, Noah Richler, books editor and columnist for the National Post.

"Emma has been kept in England," he explained, "not by the Jubilee and not by [World Cup] football, but because she's writing her next novel."

Responding to comments that Sister Crazy was largely autobiographical and gives a glimpse into the Richler family, Noah recalled that his father had discounted its autobiographical side. "It's a novel," Mordecai had told Noah. "But don't worry, you come out looking pretty good."

Richler was also briefly recalled as Montreal writer William Weintraub received the biography/memoir prize for Getting Started (McClelland and Stewart), in which he recounts his encounters and communications with Richler, Mavis Gallant and Brian Moore in the 1950s.

Another Montreal author, Prof. Morton Weinfeld, won the prize for scholarship on a Jewish Theme for Like Everyone Else... But Different (McClelland and Stewart), his study of Canada's Jewish community.

Janine Stingel received the Canadian history prize for Social Discredit (McGill-Queen's), which, as the Alberta native explained, "tells the history of the anti-Semitism that the Social Credit party participated in with vigour and vigilance in the '30s and '40s."

Stingel, who has a fundamentalist Christian background, told The CJN that she was a teenager in the nearby town of Alix when then Eckville, Alta. mayor Jim Keegstra was convicted of promoting hatred against Jews in 1985. The episode left a deep impression on her, and she felt compelled to ask: "What is it about Alberta's political culture that breeds this kind of mindset?"

Asked to supply a simple answer, Stingel said, "It's a product of very narrow, parochial thinking – provincial in the true sense of the word." (For a more detailed answer, read her book.)

Toronto native Eric Lawee said that he spent about a decade writing Isaac Abarbanel's Stance Toward Tradition (SUNY Press), which won the prize in biblical scholarship.

"It was originally a doctoral dissertation written at Harvard University under Isador Twersky, who was my mentor there," said Lawee, who is now connected with York University's Centre for Jewish Studies.

A towering historical figure, Abarbanel was as deeply involved in Jewish learning and philosophy as he was in financial, diplomatic and geopolitical affairs, Lawee explained. He was the leader of Spanish Jewry at the time of the expulsion, but failed both to anticipate the expulsion edict or to have it revoked.

The last three winners were Rabbi Erwin Schild for his Holocaust memoir, The Very Narrow Bridge (Adath Israel/Malcolm Lester); Simcha Simchovich, translator of a collection of Mordecai Gebirtig's poetry, The Song That Never Died (Mosaic), which took the Yiddish prize; and Joseph Sherman, who received the poetry prize for American Standard (Oberon).

The awards ceremony was presided over by committee member Adam Fuerstenberg, with fellow member Frances Mandell offering closing remarks. Mandell revealed that some philanthropists have begun efforts to establish an endowment fund to ensure the awards remain a permanent fixture in the community's cultural calendar.

"We would have started it this year, but with the situation in Israel, we thought it would be quite improper," she said.

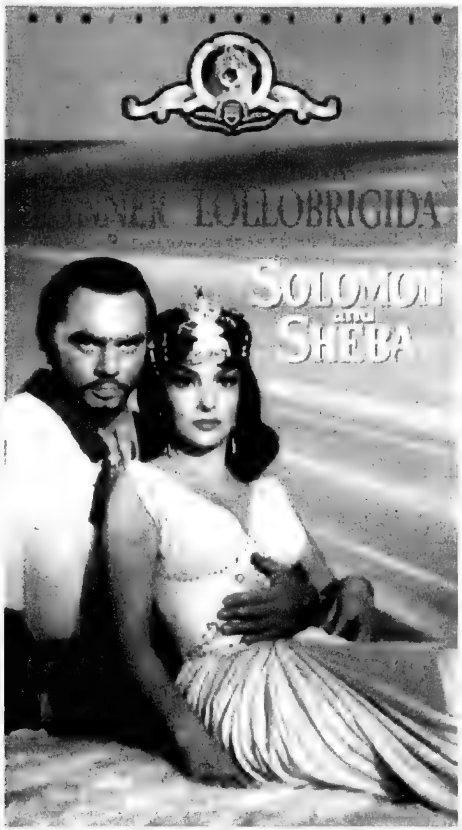
TORONTO COLLECTOR'S MOVIE POSTERS ON DISPLAY AT HEBREW UNIVERSITY

During a recent family trip to Israel, Toronto lawyer Jerry Faivish spotted a rare movie poster belonging to the Steven Spielberg Jewish Film Archive. While inquiring whether it was for sale, Faivish told archive director Marilyn Koolik of his own collection of about 5,000 Jewish-oriented posters from around the world, acquired over the past 15 years. Before the conversation was over, Faivish had happily agreed to lend the archives about 40 movie posters for exhibition.



This poster is one of over 50 on display at Hebrew U.

The posters are featured in People of the Screen, an exhibition of over 50 movie posters with Jewish themes that went on display last week in the Little Gallery of the Hebrew University's Mount Scopus campus in Jerusalem.

People of the Screen comprises 80 years of film posters, ranging from Hollywood blockbusters like Solomon and Sheba (1959) with Yul Brynner and Gina Lollobrigida, to the obscure 1935 French comedy, Moise et Salomon Parfumeurs.

Faivish, who regards posters as "symbols of Jewish history", says his hobby began in Israel after he noticed how frequently the posters kept changing on a Tel Aviv poster pole. "I realized that I was looking at layer upon layer of history and I wanted to preserve it," he says.

The exhibit, which also includes stills, frame enlargements and printed matter, is free to visitors and continues until the end of the year.

Vladeck: Inside the mind of a killer

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

During a tense moment in the one-man show Vladeck, erratic flashes of light frame a young killer as he recounts punching and kicking a helpless boy. Computerized tribal rhythms pound in the background as he says: "And I kicked and kicked and kicked. I didn't stop. Someone had to pull me off him."

Vladeck, playing at Buddies in Bad Times Theatre until June 16, explores the brutal truths of violent behaviour from the point of view of a young perpetrator.

The play addresses the issues of peer pressure and bullying as well as brother-on-brother violence and teen suicide. Without resorting to sentimentality, Jodi Miller's script prods the mind of a troubled 16-year-old videotaping his confession of a park mugging turned ugly.

Since the victim Gerald is Jewish, and Vladeck (Marcello Cabezas) and his cronies wanted cigarettes from the defiant victim, a Toronto viewer may associate the play with the Matti Baranovski killing three years ago in G. Ross Lord Park. While the producer is adamant that Vladeck is entirely fictional and says it was written several years ago, there are some uncanny similarities: a sobbing mother on the Toronto Sun's front page, an identical cause of death, the school's reaction.

Miller was also a supply teacher who frequently substituted at Northview Secondary School – the high school Baranovski went to.

Despite those similarities, however, the play stands on its own, with its effective use of a variety of media and a brilliant performance from the Dora-deserving Cabezas.

Using the speaking style of a typical teenager, Vladeck recounts the murder three times during the performance. As he videotapes his confession, which airs on a TV screen beside him. Not only does the camcorder become Vladeck's most attentive friend, but the truth of his guilt is only be suitably validated through a high-tech suicide note.

The fast-forward frenzy of the TV's images is irritating, but the scenes where Vladeck crouches an inch away from the lens illustrate the importance of the split screen. The close-up of his face reveals dripping beads of sweat that fall on the stage. As he tries to rub off non-existent blood from his boots, hysterically scrubbing the clean shoes, you can almost hear Macbeth yelling, "Out, damned spot! out, I say!" The messy truth of murder haunts the youth, and Cabezas inflects his words with strangled curses and frustrated screams.

Marcello Cabezas as Vladeck videotapes his confession.

He tries to think happy thoughts as he awaits his fatal day. "Hmm, mashed potatoes and gravy. Oh yeah, burgers and fries. And my bubbie's soup. Oh, man."

Stuck in his basement purgatory, and teased by kitchen smells, Vladeck's mind keeps returning to images of the beaten Gerald.

While Adam Pettle sprinkled his play about youth violence, Misha, with memories of the victim, Miller focuses on a killer's internal struggle to highlight the impact of the crime.

The African music that plays in the background amidst the savagery of the mob brings Lord of the Flies to mind, but the music clips enter and exit too mechanically. Often, it sounds like an abrupt push of "play" and "stop."

Sara Phillips' direction moves Cabezas around the tiny carpeted set with emotionally charged energy, breaking the monotony of an actor talking in a chair.

The issue of youth violence has stimulated discussion recently about its social impact. As this play points out, the faces of evil don't vanish overnight. The bullies need help, and they need to talk.

To paraphrase one of Vladeck's lines, the troubled teen needs to tell the truth – so help him God.

Coast to Coast

Film fest held in Vancouver

By LAUREN KRAMER
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Two films, including one made locally, stood out at the 14th annual Vancouver Jewish Film Festival, held from May 9 to 26.

The documentary Match Made in Seven, directed by Ilan Saragosti, examines the problem of being Jewish, young and single in Vancouver. The film follows several individuals as they participate in "speed dating," which consists of seven minutes spent in intense conversation with other young singles, with rather depressing results.

One eligible bachelor, Yevgeni, catches the eye of many young women and infuses his time with each of them with personality, easy conversation and laughter. Alas, though a few want to date him, he is largely uninterested. He calls only one to go out, but afterward describes her as "blah." By the movie's end, he is dating a non-Jewish woman and preparing himself for possible intermarriage and its many implications.

Then there is Lewis, a young man with only one thing on his mind: cars.

"Any woman who marries Lewis will have to understand that cars are his first love," his mother says in an interview.

Though Lewis does indeed chatter incessantly about cars throughout his conversations with prospective partners, he is the sole single in the group to have a girlfriend by the movie's end. (Local rumour has it that he is currently engaged to be married.)

The second film that stood out at the festival was Trembling Before G-d, an American documentary by director Sandi Dubowski that looks at homosexuality in the Orthodox community.

In his film, the softly spoken, 30-something New Yorker introduces us to several Orthodox gays and lesbians and the turmoil created by the conflict between their sexuality and their religious beliefs. He gives us a glimpse of their lives and the difficulties they must endure if they come out and confront the reactions of family, rabbis and the community.

We meet "Malka" and "Leah," high school sweethearts who hid their relationship behind a facade of platonic friendship for years in an effort to avoid the wrath of their families. Once they reveal they are lesbians, the parents of one woman lose all interest in her, giving her a weekly courtesy call each week before Shabbat on the instruction of their rabbi. The perfunctory five-minute call consists mainly of exchanged niceties, but causes the daughter untold grief, even as she and her partner bake their challah and prepare for the Sabbath.

Essay contest calls for submissions

The Jewish Sports Connection, a periodical promoting the discussion of sport and Jewish life, is holding an essay contest by Jewish student athletes on the topic: "How has Judaism enriched my life in sport? How has sport enriched my life as a Jew?"

Three essays, selected by a panel of judges, will be awarded Israel Bonds in the sum of $500, $360 and $180 (US), respectively.

Contest guidelines and essay submission forms may be obtained by sending a self-addressed, stamped envelope to the Jewish Sports Connection, P.O. Box 66461 St. Petersburg, FL 33736, or by e-mailing a request to JewishSports@yahoo.com.

The contest is open to Jewish high school and college students with significant involvement in organized team or individual sports. Entries must be postmarked by Aug. 15.

The Jewish Sports Connection is published by Rabbi Mitchell Smith, a member of the sport psychology registry of the United States Olympic Committee.

Tournament promotes Jewish unity

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

Joseph Edery's dream was for everyone to get along, and nothing would have made him prouder than what his sister Joyce has done to honour his memory.

The 17-year-old Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) student was instrumental in organizing the recent second annual three-on-three Joseph Edery Memorial Basketball Tournament at Toronto's Bathurst Jewish Centre as a way to remember her late brother who was killed at 17 in a traffic accident two years ago.

While Joseph Edery did not play the game, the event's theme, "Jewish unity," was one of his goals in life and the family felt the sport would bring Jews together in a unique way to convey that message.

"I know that if he was alive today, this is something he [would've] wanted to do," said Joyce Edery. "We thought about basketball because you have to work together and be united to achieve your goal.

"It touches my heart to see that we're still portraying such an important message of his. I get to see with my own eyes the impact he had on so many people – and still does."

The youth-run tournament, held this year on Mother's Day, attracted more than 100 players in the 14-23 age group. Edery hopes to also have a girls division next year if numbers warrant.

"I think for my mom that was the best Mother's Day present ever," said Edery, who noted it wasn't specifically planned to be held on that occasion. "Even though her son's not with her, an event like this was the most a mother could ever ask for."

Kathy Edery was extremely proud of her daughter's efforts and content to see today's Jewish youth exhibit such remarkable teamwork.

"It made me feel good to see all the young people participate," she said of the community's future leaders."We have good people in the youth today."

Yehuda Gelberger, along with teammates Gabriel Leventhal and Ben Burk were victorious, winning all five of their single-elimination games. They each received autographed basketballs, signed by Toronto Raptors forward Antonio Davis.

"I think (the tournament) had the perfect combination," said Gelberger, a friend of Edery's, who plays centre for the CHAT Tigers basketball team. "It's a competition and everybody always tries to win. I think it was amazing seeing everybody come out and get along. There was no worries about fights, even verbal fights."

Joyce Edery says her brother meant the world to her and this tournament allows his message and his memory to live on.

Tournament participants paid a $10 entry fee and a portion of the proceeds went to Kids for Kids, an Israeli organization that helps victims of terror. Donations to the fund can still be made by calling 416-993-8469.

The theme of exile is explored in this interesting novel about a young, Italian Jewish woman fleeing Nazi Europe.

• Losers and Keepers in Argentina, by Nina Barragan, University of New Mexico Press, $32.95, SC.

This interesting work of fiction is based on the experiences of Russian Jewish immigrants who began a small agricultural community in Argentina in the late 1800s that lasted until the latter part of the 20th century. Difficult to put down, it provides wonderful insight into the Jewish, Latin-American culture.

(The author will read from the novel at Israel's Eglinton location on Thursday, July 11, 7:30 p.m.)

• The Names Leave the Stones, by Steven Michael Berzensky, Coteau Books, $16.95, SC.

NON-FICTION

• My Life as a Radical Jewish Woman, by Puah Rakovsky, Indiana University Press, $46.95, HC.

• Nothing Makes You Free, edited by Melvin Jules Bukiet, W.W. Norton & Company, $39.99, HC.

These powerful writings, fiction and memoirs, by accomplished writers who are descendants of Holocaust survivors, demonstrate how deeply such evil affects not only the victims of that time, but generations to come. A great addition to Holocaust literature.

• Maimonides and the Hermeneutics of Concealment: Deciphering Scripture and Midrash in The Guide of the Perplexed, by James Arthur Diamond, State University of New York Press, $35.95, HC.

"Diamond shows very well how Maimonides is just too important to be left to antiquarian interest alone." (David Novak, University of Toronto)

• Six Days of War: June 1967 and the Making of the Modern Middle East, by Michael B. Oren, Oxford University Press, $34.95, HC.

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

I have always spent my summers away at overnight camp. I look forward to it every year and I always have a great time. But this year I am having second thoughts about going. I recently started dating a guy at my school and things between us are going really well. I am worried that if I am away all summer his feelings for me will change, or he will find a new girlfriend. It's almost making me want to stay home. What do you think I should do?

Confused

Dear Confused,

It's very important that you live you own life and consider your own needs. If camp is something that has always been a part of your life, you should not change that because of a guy.

There are a few different ways of approaching the situation. Your first option is to put your relationship on hold for the summer. This way you are both free to see other people and you will not have to worry constantly about what he is doing at home. You will be able to focus on making friends and enjoying the activities camp has to offer.

Your other option is to stay loyal to one another despite the distance between you. This is not easy, and it requires you to be very honest with each other. You need to understand that he may spend time with other girls while you are gone but that this has nothing to do with his feelings for you. Long distance relationships are very difficult, but they can also be very rewarding. If you can survive being apart for long periods of time, you will also be able to conquer other problems later on in your relationship.

Only you know which is the right decision. Discuss the situation with your boyfriend and see how he feels before coming to any conclusions. Remember that a summer is not that long. If you are meant to be together, a few months apart will not change anything.

Dear Karilani is written on a rotating basis by three high school students. The drawing is a composite. We welcome questions from our readers. Please mail, e-mail or fax them to The CJN.

CLC criticizes Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

It was a bad week for supporters of Israel in the Canadian labour movement.

A few days after the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) Ontario introduced an emergency resolution slamming Israel, the Canadian Labour Congress (CLC) convention passed a resolution last week in Vancouver calling on Israel to withdraw from Palestinian areas, while the organization's executive committee and council adopted a policy statement comparing Israel to South Africa under apartheid.

The union statements were quickly condemned by Canadian Jewish Congress, Jewish labour representatives and other supporters of Israel.

Congress called them "simplistic and replete with inaccuracies and just plain errors."

Lil Nobel, president of CUPE local 2063, which represents office workers at Jewish community agencies in Toronto, said she believes the resolution misrepresents the facts and in effect supports Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat. Nobel had been sharply critical of CUPE Ontario's earlier emergency resolution, but was unable to attend the CLC meeting to raise objections to the resolution that was passed.

Bob Rae: statement 'completely wrongheaded'

Former Ontario premier Bob Rae was highly critical of the CLC's policy statement. "When someone says Israel is acting like South Africa or is an apartheid state, there's no civil discussion you can have. It indicates a level of ignorance and animosity toward the state which to me is over the line," said Rae, speaking to the Jewish Civil Rights Educational Foundation of Canada last week.

Rae, Ontario's only NDP premier, told The CJN's Frances Kraft that the statement is "completely wrong-headed, and I think it ignores any fair or balanced assessment of the history. It's sort of reaching for simplistic solutions. I think it represents a huge step backward for the CLC and everybody else."

Perhaps the most scathing critique of the CLC, a national body that represents 2.5 million unionized workers, came from former CLC president Dennis McDermott, who accused the organization of "coming down on Israel like a ton of bricks, and by association, Jewish people everywhere."

The News in Brief

CANADA

Waxman Statue

TORONTO — A bronze statue of the late actor Al Waxman, created by Canadian sculptor Ruth Abernethy, will be installed June 23 in Bellevue Square Park in the heart of Kensington Market. It will celebrate Waxman's life and his efforts to make Canadians of all backgrounds feel part of the country. Waxman, who grew up in Kensington Market, starred in the 1970s CBC TV show King of Kensington. He died unexpectedly in January 2001 at 65 from complications resulting from heart surgery.

ISRAEL

Team Probes Arad

JERUSALEM — Israel has appointed a "brainstorming team" to investigate the case of missing airman Ron Arad, who was captured by the Amal militia after bailing out during a mission over Lebanon in October 1986. Amal handed Arad to Hezbollah, which apparently gave him to Iran. His whereabouts have not been known for years, and it is not clear if he is still alive. The new team, headed by former Tel Aviv District Court President Eliahu Winograd, will examine all available information and have access to material from both military intelligence and, in an unusual step, the Mossad.

Israel's 'Nobel'

TEL AVIV — Tel Aviv University has awarded the first annual Dan David Prizes, Israel's equivalent to the Nobel Prize. The recipients were the Warburg Institute Library in London, for its historical research; W. Daniel Hillis, for his contribution to computer technology and artificial intelligence, and Sydney Brenner, John Sulston and Robert Waterston for their discoveries in biogenetics and contributions to the mapping of the human genome.

Guarding Settlements

JERUSALEM — The Israeli army is considering replacing soldiers at Jewish settlements with private security guards, according to a military official. A pilot project will be tried in the Gush Etzion block of settlements south of Jerusalem, Maj.-Gen. Yiftah Ron-Tal said. Some military officials have complained that guarding the settlements takes soldiers away from other missions.

Shoah Sketch in Space

JERUSALEM — An Israeli astronaut plans to bring a Holocaust-era drawing to space. Col. Ilan Ramon contacted Jerusalem's Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial requesting an item to take with him when he blasts off July 19 aboard a NASA space shuttle. Yad Vashem chose the drawing Moon Landscape created by Peter Ginz, a 14-year-old Jewish boy, during his incarceration in the Terezin transit camp. Ginz was later killed in Auschwitz. Ramon's mother survived Auschwitz, but his other family members died in Nazi camps.

WORLD

UN Manoeuvre

UNITED NATIONS — Syria, now president of the United Nations Security Council, was forced to circulate a letter last week accusing itself of supporting terror. The letter was sent by Israel's ambassador to the UN, Yehuda Lancry, to the president of the Security Council, Syrian ambassador Mikhail Wehbe. Lancry asked Wehbe to circulate the letter as a Security Council document. As head of the council, Syria had no choice. The letter said Israel "is appalled that a member of the Security Council continues to lend its support to organizations committed to the deliberate murder of civilians." One Israeli diplomat called the episode a small victory in diplomatic protocol.

Slave Trade

WASHINGTON — The U.S. State Department has taken Israel off its list of countries that traffic in women. The State Department's annual report on the so-called white slave trade, published June 4, notes that Israel has been making significant efforts to stop international prostitution rings.

Revocation Case

WASHINGTON — U.S Justice Department authorities have initiated proceedings to revoke the citizenship of a Millbury, Mass. man who allegedly participated in the Nazi destruction of the Warsaw Ghetto. The complaint alleges that Vladas Zajanckauskas served as a guard and a guard trainer at the Trawniki camp, and that he participated in the Warsaw Ghetto liquidation in the spring of 1943. The complaint alleges that Zajanckauskas, 87, concealed his Nazi service when he immigrated to the United States in 1950.

Jewish Patrols are Warned

NEW YORK — New York's police commissioner has issued a warning after an obscure Jewish group said it would begin armed patrols in Jewish sections of Brooklyn.

The police department "will not tolerate anyone brandishing weapons under the guise of protecting others," Ray Kelly said last week. "Anyone attempting to patrol the streets armed with weapons will be arrested."

Kelly issued the warning after the little-known Jewish Defense Group said it plans to start patrolling Jewish neighbourhoods armed with shotguns, baseball bats and lead pipes. The group said it was acting after a suspected terrorist jailed in Iraq said in a television interview that those who carried out the 1993 World Trade Center bombing originally wanted to target Jewish areas in Brooklyn.

ROM exhibition includes Italian Judaica

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

A Royal Ontario Museum exhibit highlighting masterpieces from the Vatican and a host of Italian museums features a section on Judaica.

Images of Salvation, which runs until Aug. 11 in the Garfield Weston Exhibition Hall, showcases Hebrew bibles, a Passover Haggadah and a Torah, all hundreds of years old.

It is curated by an Italian and a Canadian, Giovanni Morello and Corey Keeble.

Morello is director of the Vatican Library and chair of the Vatican Museum's scientific committee.

Keeble is curator of decorative arts at the Royal Ontario's Museum's Department of Western Art and Culture.

Two years ago, he established its first permanent collection of European Judaica, the Dr. Fred Weinberg and Joy Cherry Weinberg Judaica Collection

"You can't have an exhibit like this without Judaica," said Keeble, referring to Images of Salvation, presented with the support of Hydro One.

"The people who put this together placed tremendous emphasis on honouring the contributions of Jewish scriptures, the foundation stone of the whole exhibit," he added. "They were profoundly respectful of the traditions of Jewish scriptures."

Images of Salvation, he noted, should speak to all people, regardless of religion and place of origin. "We're all brothers and sisters."

The exhibit, which coincides with World Youth Day and Pope John Paul's visit to Toronto, scheduled for July, consists of over 100 artifacts, from paintings and manuscripts to sculptures and liturgical objects.

Some are on display for the first time outside Italy.

Artistic masterpieces range from Michelangelo's early drawings for the Sistine Chapel and paintings by masters like Luca Giordano, Guido Reni and Giovani Francesco Barbieri.

There are also statues by Bernini and tapestries by the school of Raphael and Rubens.

The Judaica consists of the following:

• Passover Haggadah, 13th century, Venice, from the Parma Biblioteca Palatina.

15th century Bible from Florence, Biblioteca Medicea Laurenziana.

• Bible, 16th century, Catalan or southern France, from the Modena Biblioteca Estense.

• Torah, early 15th century with 17th-18th century wood case, Middle East, from the Citta del Vaticano, Musei Vaticani and Museo Missionario Etnologico.

• Bible, 13th century, Bologne, from the Castello del Buonconsiglio. Monumenti e collezioni provinciali.

• Pentateuch, 13th century, Florence, from the Parma Biblioteca Palatina.

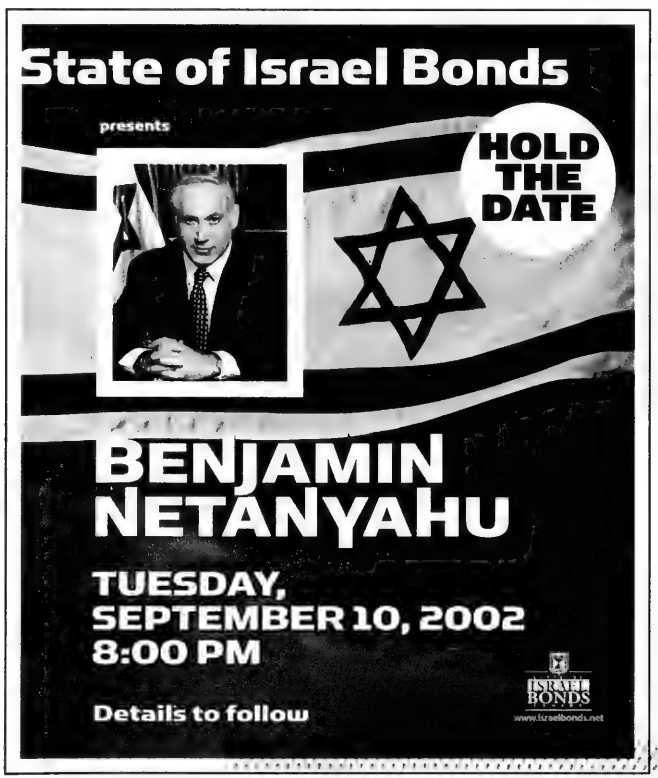
• Bible, 15th century, Florence, from the Biblioteca Medicea Laurenziana in Firenze.

• Bible, 11th century, Bologne, from the Biblioteca Universitaria di Bologne.

Apart from Judaica per se, Images of Salvation displays paintings inspired by the Hebrew Bible, from Filippo Palizzi's After the Flood (1863) to Pier Francesco Mazzucchelli's The Flight of Jacob with the Angel (1610).

There are also engravings of the prophets Isaiah and Jeremiah by Enea Vico (1523-1567) and Nicola Beatricetto (1515-1565), respectively.

"Judaica," said Keeble, "is acknowledged in terms of the totality of the exhibit."



It's always a good time to say 'Shalom'.

My Fair Lady

The Stratford Festival of Canada is celebrating its 50th year. One of the magnificent mainstay columns in the soaring, many-chambered structure of Canadian cultural and literary life, the festival returns each spring to re-anchor the pillar of exhilarating, fine theatre into the thawing Canadian soul.

Last week, for a pleasurably transfixing afternoon, I was able to rest against that pillar and take in the festival's production of My Fair Lady.

It was a marvellous show.

From the opening scene when the curtain lifted on the Covent Garden street market outside the opera house in turn-of-the-20th-century London, it crackled with energy, pace and enthusiasm.

This is the second time that the award-winning play has been performed at Stratford and the ensemble is to be congratulated for an engaging afternoon of grand entertainment.

The play first appeared on Broadway in 1956, a collaboration between the musically creative team of Alan Jay Lerner and Frederick Loewe. It ran for 2,717 performances in New York and 2,281 performances in London.

A film version of the play appeared in 1964 and won eight Oscars, including one for Best Picture.

Most people over the age of 30 are probably familiar with the story of My Fair Lady. For young readers, though, a very brief synopsis is in order.

The story revolves around the efforts of a phonetics expert, Prof. Henry Higgins, and his colleague, Colonel Pickering, also an expert in languages, to educate a young, raffish flower girl, Eliza Doolittle, in the ways of proper, refined English speech and personal comportment.

A bright young woman, Eliza learns quickly and well. But once she passes the test, both she and her professor mentor must confront new choices about themselves. Neither can return to the way things were before.

Although a romantic musical comedy, there is still enough bite left from Pygmalion, the social satire written by George Bernard Shaw upon which the musical is based, to stir the conscience.

Ever the social iconoclast, Shaw pokes a great deal of fun at the distinctly British system of class differentiation that existed some hundred years ago.

From the early moments in the play, when we meet the hawkers and peddlers on the street and the stentorian professor surreptitiously observing their interactions, the playwright contrasts the different moralities of the "undeserving poor" and the "middle class" as playfully, though poignantly, articulated by Eliza's father.

The contrast is further sharpened in the scene of the Ascot Races when we see the studiously developed, emotionless, detached ennui of the upper classes and the refreshing, guileless, spontaneous responses of the still "unfinished" Eliza.

But while poking fun at the pieties, hypocricies and false nostrums of class distinction, the play really is about personal transformations.

Both lead characters undergo profound change. Eliza changes externally. She elevates her language and appearance. Prof. Higgins changes internally. He elevates his conscience and capacity for caring.

The creative tension throughout the play is whether the two will meet at the midpoint of the path they have both traversed.

The cast of this production is outstanding.

Colm Feore, who plays Higgins, is masterful, commanding the stage with his movements, expressions, singing and speech. He makes the audience feel for him despite his condescending professorial manner at the moment he realizes he may have lost Eliza. Helplessly, with his irritating, supercilious veneer fallen away, he calls for his mother. Feore is perfect.

Skilled and polished, Cynthia Dale moves effortlessly from the insecure, howling Eliza of Covent Garden to the breathtakingly graceful and captivating Eliza of the Embassy Ball.

The interplay between Feore and Dale is the dramatic core of the play. It is seamless and smooth, whether evoking laughter in the pre-Rain in Spain scene in the professor's study or evoking pathos and pity when, totally neglected by the pedantic, unfeeling Higgins, Eliza decides to leave the professor's tutelage.

The key "supporting" roles are also played very strongly. Barry MacGregor is a straight-as-an-arrow Pickering, ethical, conscience-bound, though borderline-obtuse.

James Blendick is a loveable Alfred P. Doolittle. Though perhaps not rakish or roguish enough for the philandering, conscience-challenged father of Eliza, his singing is velvet and his twinkling mischievous grin a treat.

It is through his character, primarily, that the playwright brings home the social satire and hardscrabble wisdom of the street.

The choreography, singing and staging transport the audience to a time and place far removed from our own. The sheer visual splendour and colour of the Ascot and Embassy scenes, in particular, are electric.

Joyce Campion as the professor's wise, no-nonsense mother and Susan Gilmour as Mrs. Pierce, the woman who runs the professor's household are rock-solid.

Early in the play Higgins speaks of the "human being with a soul... and a divine gift of speech." That is precisely what the audience gets to see and hear at this production of My Fair Lady.

Sharon's Palestinian policy termed unrealistic

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Ariel Sharon's Palestinian policy is flawed and unrealistic, says a prominent Israeli analyst.

Yossi Alpher, former director of Tel Aviv University's Jaffee Center for Strategic Studies, claimed that Sharon's approach is basically unviable because it is rejected by the Palestinians, the Arab world and the United States.

Sharon, he explained in a talk last week at the Kollel sponsored by Canadian Friends of Peace Now, is prepared to accept a Palestinian state in about 42 per cent of the West Bank and about 80 per cent of the Gaza Strip, but only under certain conditions.

These are: a complete cessation of the current violence sparked by the intifadah, the removal of Yasser Arafat from the presidency of the Palestinian Authority (PA) and the wholesale reform of the PA.

In addition, Sharon wants to retain all the Jewish settlements in the territories, even isolated ones, in the belief that they will help Israel maintain physical control of the West Bank and Gaza.

Alpher, a former senior officer in the Mossad, Israel's external intelligence agency, suggested that the Palestinians, the Arab states and the United States will not embrace the idea of a small, territorially disconnected Palestinian entity to defuse the Arab-Israeli dispute.

"This is a non-starter and doesn't stand a chance," said Alpher, an advisor to Prime Minister Ehud Barak during the Camp David summit in July 2000.

At that summit, Israel reportedly offered Arafat much of the West Bank and all of Gaza in exchange for an end-of-conflict agreement. Arafat rejected the overture.

Alpher compared Sharon's faith in military power to influence the structure and composition of the PA to Israel's "disastrous" and "manipulative" policy in Lebanon in the early 1980s.

By sheer force, Israel cajoled Lebanon into signing a peace treaty in 1983, but it quickly fell apart as a result of Syria's opposition.

"Sharon doesn't have a realistic peace strategy," said Alpher, summing up the prime minister's policy.

Nor does Arafat have a realistic policy, noted Alpher, a consultant to Americans for Peace Now and the Reform movement.

"Arafat is dragged from one strategic situation to another."

Some Israeli strategists, he observed, contend that Arafat never embraced a two-state solution and that his real goal is the transformation of Israel into a Palestinian state – the "Palestinianization" of Israel.

Current diplomatic efforts aimed at achieving an end to Israel's struggle with the Palestinians will probably fail because the two sides are still too far apart on fundamental issues, he said.

Alpher said that the Oslo peace procedure, currently championed by former cabinet minister Yossi Beilin, is considered unrealistic by most Israelis today.

Oslo fell into disrepute because many Israelis viewed Palestinian demands as extreme and because Arafat lost his credibility in and outside Israel.

Yet Israel and the Palestinians may resume bilateral negotiations on the basis of the Taba talks, which ended inconclusively in January 2001, Alpher predicted.

The majority of Israelis, traumatized by the current wave of suicide bombings, support a unilateral pullout from parts of the West Bank and Gaza, the dismantlement of isolated settlements and the construction of a fortified fence along the length of the West Bank.

Israel's frontier with the West Bank is porous and wide open, Alpher said.

"You can simply walk across the border. That's where we are. We've reached this position because the establishment of physical barriers is liable to have political connotations."

By contrast, not a single suicide bomber has come from Gaza, which is fenced off from Israel.

Due to public opinion, the Israeli government has begun construction of a fence along the West Bank.

But Alpher warned that the army will not be able to guard the fence properly if it is pinned down guarding isolated settlements.

He said Israel faces a demographic threat to its status as a Jewish, democratic state.

"Within 10 years, between the Jordan River and the Mediterranean Sea, there will be more Arabs than Jews."

When that happens, the notion of a two-state solution will become passé, and the Palestinians will press for a "one-man-one-vote" solution.

"We're heading for a South African situation," he said.

Some Israelis therefore insist that demography is more important than geography, said Alpher, a member of the Council for Peace and Security, which calls for a unilateral withdrawal.

Such Israelis are increasingly demanding unilateral separation from the Palestinians, he added.

He said that the peace process has radicalized Israeli Arabs, who may yet comprise one-third of Israel's population in the future, and that Iran is waging war against Israel through a Lebanese proxy, Hezbollah.

CORRECTION

The article, "Young journalist sees glimmers of peace in next generation" (CJN, June 6), refers to Michael Hoechsmann as a "pro-Palestinian assignment editor at Young People's Press." It was never The CJN's intention to put Hoechsmann in a negative light, and we apologize for this representation.

Also, the story stated that it was Hoechsmann who urged the 17-year-old to attend a Palestinian-hosted press conference in New York City. It was her assignment editor from On the Record for Children who asked her to attend. The CJN regrets the error.

Feld Carr honoured for work with Syrian Jews

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Special to The CJN

For 4½ years, brothers Eli and Selim Swed were held in a Syrian jail cell 50 feet underground. They were tortured, beaten and at times were sick and denied medical treatment.

The Sweds were detained and jailed in 1987 after Syrian authorities discovered that, in separate trips, they had secretly travelled via Italy to visit their sisters in Israel after being allowed to travel elsewhere. They were formally charged with spying after four years behind bars.

Judy Feld Carr

Working behind the scenes, Torontonian Judy Feld Carr bribed officials to grant the brothers a shower and shave, sent money to feed and clothe Selim 's wife and seven children, and, finally, bought their freedom.

"They were so badly tortured, they could not have survived another day," Carr said in an interview.

The brothers now live in Israel with their families.

Over the course of almost three decades, Feld Carr rescued 3,228 Jews from Syrian oppression by bribing officials, fund-raising, and sending information using coded messages.

On June 5 in Toronto, Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Centre For Holocaust Studies presented Feld Carr with the Wiesenthal Award for Tolerance, Justice and Human Rights at a gala evening in her honour.

"Her convictions, her commitment and her actions gave hope and then freedom to an entire community of people," said Ron Hoffman, co-chair of the event, in a speech presenting Feld Carr with the award.

This commitment to helping Syrian Jewry began in the early 1970s, when she and her late husband, Ronald Feld, learned that 12 young Jewish men had been killed running across a minefield trying to escape Syria and that others were trapped in the country or had been murdered.

The Felds began writing to members of Parliament, holding public meetings and writing letters to the editor.

When her husband died, the Beth Tzedec Congregation's board of governors established The Dr. Ronald Feld Fund and Feld Carr continued the couple's work. At age 33, with three young children to support, she began building the underground network that would become a lifeline for Syrian Jews.

It was dangerous work that Feld Carr admits took an emotional toll.

"I had a lot of fear. The fear was like you cannot believe," she said in an interview after the presentation. "I had two lives – one being the mother, the wife, buying groceries, cooking dinners, going to school meetings and I never talked about what I was doing."

Feld Carr, who has received numerous tributes to her heroism, including Brandeis University's Abram L. Sachar Medallion and the Order of Canada, says she was overwhelmed by the gala put on by the Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center.

"It was an evening that could not be forgotten," she said after the presentation.

It included a documentary film prepared by Israel-based TV journalist Martin Himel who interviewed some of the Syrian Jews saved by Feld Carr, as well as performances by cellist Ofra Harnoy, singer Michael Burgess and Liberty Silver of The StarsBand. The audience of close to 1,300 people gave Feld Carr two standing ovations.

Continents apart, but issues related

Images of the protests on the streets of Halifax against the meeting there of the G7 finance ministers filled our television screens last weekend. The demonstrations were nasty. The two sides squared off against each other: the protesters – many experienced and well-drilled in foisting anarchic mayhem upon the establishment, identities hidden, faces masked against the inevitable barrage of tear gas – and the police – mostly experienced and well-drilled in trying to defend the establishment against the anarchy and the mayhem, identities in full public view, but faces also masked against the barrage of whatever detritus would be hurled at them by the opposing side.

The inevitable happened. Protesters advanced, police dug in, things were thrown, police advanced, more things were thrown, police felt threatened, tear gas discharged. Mayhem ensued. It was all so formulaic, and by now, all so sadly familiar.

But astute viewers watching the proceedings will have noticed a new element in the protests. In the vanguard of the disagreeable defile were a number of marchers carrying the Palestinian flag.

The vilification of Israel that was the hallmark at the Durban anti-racism conference last September repeats again and again. The anti-globalization movement – not just the nihilists and anarchists among them who exploit the former's legitimate cover – thus, publicly endorse and adopt the campaign against Israel.

It is a campaign, however, that turns morals and morality on their head. It is also a campaign that the 34th Zionist Congress, which began a continent away in Jerusalem the day after the Halifax protests ended, must address.

As these words are being written, the congress will have just begun. Some 1,200 delegates from around the Jewish world have come together to earnestly debate the interrelated, searing issues of the day concerning Zionism, Israel and the Jewish people.

One of those issues, alas, is the alarming resurrection of anti-Semitism across the European continent.

What was thought by most of the post-Holocaust generation to have been consigned to the ignorant attitudes and bigoted behaviours of a blood-soaked, bygone age has arisen again, shockingly, from the dark, latent prejudices against the Jewish people. Israel's conflict with the Palestinian Authority and myriad related terrorist groupings is merely the excuse that lets the prejudices loose. It is deeply disappointing that many of the anti-globalizationists and their NGO supporters are now the agencies spreading the anti-Israel and anti-Semitic bacteria around the world.

Fighting for Israel and its cause will be at the top of the congress agenda. The justice of Israel's cause does not preclude, nor has it ever precluded, justice for the long-suffering Palestinians. But the way to achieve justice for both is neither the hate-filled violence of Palestinian terrorists, nor the ignorant, chaotic violence of Halifax protesters.

Harold Pomerantz (Letters, CJN, June 6), like many of what I presume is the older generation of the Jewish community, is in favour of the current Israeli policy, military occupation of Palestine. I am not, and my position is well within the mainstream of Israeli society, as evidenced by the 100,000 strong who recently marched on Rabin Square.

When the "Jewish right," if we can call it that, paints all of its ideological rivals as anti-Semitic, it trivializes the real and dangerous anti-Semitism and other pernicous forms of prejudice, including Islamophobia. As well, since I do not begrudge Pomerantz for having his position and he begrudges me for having mine, he engages in what could be called a sort of anti-Semitism, since he is attacking a significant element of the Jewish community.

Nothing in my opinion piece provides "excuses for Arab terrorism." On the contrary, I explicitly condemn Arab terrorism, and particularly how Britain and the United States have used it as a proxy in Saudi Arabia, Afghanistan and elsewhere. The unbelievably evil suicide bombings are a "blowback" from the West's refusal to help the progressive, liberal elements of the Arab world. Israel's reaction – the attack on the civilian structure of the Palestinian Authority, as well as the indiscriminate use of force – I fear will only put Israel in even more danger.

As Lipman points out, more and more progressive Jews support Israel, yet not its current government. Democracies, after all, require dissent. We call for a two-state solution, as well as a change in tactics vis-à-vis the Palestinian territories.

We should be realists

In your editorial of June 13 called "A Catastrophic Leader," you wrote, "The Palestinian people, the majority of whom, one hopes, simply want to live in peace, are trapped in a never-ending whorl of violence."

On the day I received my copy of The CJN, the National Post, quoting Reuters, published the results of the latest Palestinian opinion poll, the results of which throw a different light on the reactions of the Palestinian people to this "whorl of violence": "A majority of Palestinians believe the aim of their 20-month uprising should be to eliminate Israel and not merely to end the Israeli occupation of the West Bank and Gaza Strip," the study concluded.

In spite of what we'd like to believe, reality contradicts us. Most of us Jews have always been realists and whenever we followed the lure of false messiahs we paid very dearly for our errors.

Deliberate delusions have never served us well. It is better to face grim facts than to pretend they do not exist.

YPP editor not Pro-Palestinian

While I commend your newspaper for publishing a profile on Naomi Lightman ("Young journalist sees glimmers of peace in next generation," CJN, June 6), I was shocked to see myself represented as "her pro-Palestinian assignment editor at Young People's Press (YPP)" who "insisted that she attend" a press conference hosted by Al-Haq in New York. I did not give Lightman this assignment, nor was I even present when she received it from an editor at On the Record for Children, a publication of the NGO Committee on UNICEF.

More importantly, however, I find it troubling that a willingness to listen to Palestinians presupposes a pro-Palestinian bias. Journalists are trained to seek balance and to listen to opinions that they may find personally difficult. Lightman wrote a courageous piece and I find it disturbing that your newspaper needs to find a villain accountable for her exposure to Palestinian views. That is patronizing to Lightman, who in no way is a patsy for propaganda, and it is discrediting to YPP.

I am afraid that your reporter is inventing goblins that do not exist. YPP is not "pro-Palestinian." In fact, YPP's publisher, Gary Gould and some of the company's board members are of the Jewish faith.

Finding the right single

Prompted by Darcie Richler's update ("Finding likeable people in the city," CJN, June 6), I thought your readers might be interested in a follow-up from me as well. I also received an unexpected response from several men to my letter to the editor ("Looking for dream men, too," CJN, Apr 5).

Unfortunately they didn't fit my definition, but I know that nice Jewish men are out there somewhere. In fact, a friend has recently introduced me to one of them! Since I am just as determined as Darcie to provide a solution to this problem, I have accepted the chairmanship of Adath Israel Congregation's Dynamic Singles committee. In addition to continuing our very successful Sunday brunches for the 35- plus crowd, we are in the preliminary stages of organizing events for younger Jewish singles as well. So look for our ads in The CJN. That special person may not be so hard to find after all.

The IDF's new imagemaker

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Members of the Israel Defence Forces general staff met recently for a seminar given by the Israel Democracy Institute on relations between the military and the media as part of the incoming chief of staff's strategy to improve the IDF's international image.

The major-general named as next chief of staff, Moshe Ya'alon, praised the media as the watchdog of democracy. He had no nostalgia for the days before the Yom Kippur War, he said, but reiterated the army's usual complaint about media bias.

"The senior level in the IDF is mature and understands the importance of the media, but within the system, there is a sense that the army is engaged in Graeco-Roman wrestling with rules, and the media are playing catch and hitting below the belt," Ya'alon said.

Ruth Yaron

Ya'alon has brought in a reserve player as IDF spokesperson so he doesn't need to rely on the Foreign Ministry and other civilian organizations to explain the army's actions to the world. Ruth Yaron, a diplomat from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, will begin in a month with the rank of brigadier-general – the first woman on the general staff. For six years, she served as media adviser at the embassy in Washington, and she has worked with the press and television in the United States.

Yaron takes up her position as IDF spokesperson at a time when the IDF is enjoying tremendous prestige among the Israeli public. The hostilities with the Palestinians have put the IDF at centre-stage after years of an almost continuously receding image following the blunder of the Yom Kippur War in 1973 and the failures in the Lebanon War in 1982.

The media, which used to be obedient and enthusiastic, have become increasingly critical, and in the decade preceding the current intifadah, covered mostly accidents and fatal disasters in the army. These have been forgotten during the 21 months of hostilities.

These days, generals are popular interviewees and the influence of the army is clear in the setting of security policy. In the local market, the main mission of the military spokesperson is to keep the rating high.

With respect to the foreign media, a great effort is needed to fight bias. Modern warfare is conducted not only on the field, but also on CNN, where they are less excited by the IDF's achievements against "the terror infrastructure" than they are about the harm done to Palestinians.

The IDF, which left journalists outside when it entered the Jenin refugee camp during Operation Defensive Shield, afterward had to deal with accusations of a massacre and almost had to face an investigation by a UN commission.

"The nature of warfare has changed and we are making mistakes as a result of misunderstanding the changes," Maj.-Gen. Giora Eiland, head of Plans and Policy Directorate said in a recent lecture.

"The perception of the reality is more important than the reality itself," he said.

According to Eiland, the balance of warfare in the present conflict is determined by the international community, which dictates the game's boundaries for both sides. Mistakes that have been made by Israel, such as the demolition of the houses in Rafah at the beginning of this year, harmed its image and, in hindsight, accelerated the hostilities.

At the seminar, Mofaz said: "We erred in the world's eyes by declaring a closed military area," adding that commanders in the field were too "trigger-happy" in signing closure orders that kept the media away.

"The area has to be open; that's the historical mistake that the time has come to mend," Mofaz said.

Army personnel believe a suitable spokesperson in such a conflict would be either a civilian who understands the media or a field commander who radiates authority on security issues and can overcome the obstinacy of commanders in the field.

Yaron is more in the "civilian" mould, though in the past three years, she has served as chief instructor at the National Security College. Her mission will not be an easy one. She will be coming up against a male, conservative and suspicious command that has doubts about the professional authority of anyone who has not served in the Golani Brigade and has not invaded targets. She will also have to face off with commanders who do not want to see correspondents and cameras on the battlefield.

Those who know Yaron expect that she will not be a mere adornment at general staff meetings. They describe her as professional, ambitious, opinionated, diligent and devoted to her job and her superiors. Rather than making TV appearances, she will focus on making behind-the-scenes personal connections and briefings in order to influence and shape media coverage of the army.

It is unlikely to assume that she will become the "national explainer" and fight for air time. She will prefer to influence what the CNN Mideast correspondent says in his report.

Yaron, 45, was born in Algeria and immigrated to Israel with her parents when she was 4½ years old. Her parents had been members of the B'nei Akiva youth movement, and were among the few members of the Algerian Jewish community who went to Israel without passing through France first. At home – Yaron grew up in Be'er Sheva – they spoke French.

In February 1974, after the Yom Kippur War, Yaron was chosen to be a member of a youth delegation sent to the United States to promote Israel. It was on that trip that she decided to become a diplomat.

In the army, Yaron served as an officer in Nahal (combined settlement and military service program) and was demobilized with the rank of first lieutenant. Studies in political science and international relations led to the training course for the diplomatic corps at the Foreign Ministry, where she became acquainted with Avi Gil, who is currently the ministry's director general. The two have been good friends ever since.

> Demobilized with the rank of first lieutenant

When she completed the course, Yaron asked to serve in Africa, and was posted to the Ivory Coast. From there, she went to Canada, and returned to Israel to the American desk at headquarters in Jerusalem. At the end of 1989, the ministry was looking for a spokesperson for the embassy in Washington, and was considering whether to appoint a professional from outside or to make a professional appointment within the ministry. Foreign minister Moshe Arens and his deputy, Benjamin Netanyahu, recommended Yaron, who was the youngest of the candidates and had no media experience.

At the embassy in Washington, Yaron served with a succession of three ambassadors: Moshe Arad, Zalman Shuval and Itamar Rabinovich. The challenges varied according to the government that was ruling in Jerusalem at the time. At first there was the "government of paralysis" of Shimon Peres and Yitzhak Shamir. Then came the Likud government that got into conflicts with the first administration of president George Bush and his secretary of state, James Baker, over the question of "guarantees or Jewish settlements in the territories." In the summer of 1992, Yitzhak Rabin came to power, presaging a new era of peace agreements with the Palestinians and Jordan and peace talks with Syria.

The spokesperson at the embassy in Washington represents Israel in the capital of the most important country in the world. He or she must be in close touch with both the Israeli correspondents in the United States and the American media. Yaron learned very quickly that it is necessary to understand journalists' special needs and to tailor stories to them individually, as well as to return every phone call, to initiate and not just respond, and to arrange interviews and meetings with important visiting personalities from Israel. She developed personal ties with several columnists, including Tom Friedman from the New York Times.

"There are some persons whom trying to reach is a waste of time, but with Ruth we always knew that we shouldn't send through an item without speaking to her, even at the last minute," says an American reporter who covered relations with Israel at the time.

To succeed in the job, the army spokesperson needs up-to-the-minute information updates. Yaron attained the height of her influence at the embassy during Rabinovich's time. He made her his personal adviser and let her sit in on the secret talks he was conducting with the Syrians. Yaron often accompanied Rabinovich on his trips to Israel during secretary of state Warren Christopher's whistle-stop tours of the Middle East to deal with the American reporters, who paid her back with phone calls about what they heard in briefings in Damascus.

During that period, Yaron also nurtured ties with Arab reporters and became friendly with her fellow-spokesperson at the Jordanian Embassy, Marwan Muashar. The development of their respective careers illustrates what has happened to the peace process. Both of them returned from Washington to Israel – Muashar as his country's ambassador to Tel Aviv and Yaron as director of the Jordanian department at the Foreign Ministry – at the height of good relations between the two countries.

Today, Muashar is foreign minister of Jordan, travelling around the world to protest "the killing of Palestinians in the territories," and Yaron explains the operations of the IDF.

When she returned to Israel in 1995, Yaron brought home a souvenir picture from the ceremony of the signing of the Oslo accords on the White House lawn, with a dedication from former U.S. president Bill Clinton. A blank space was left for Rabin's autograph, but he never had the chance to sign. To this day, the picture hangs in her office, with the gap still in it.

In the fall of 1996, Yaron was injured in a serious traffic accident. After she recovered, she went to study at the National Security College. The commander of the military college at the time, Maj.-Gen. Yitzhak Brik, suggested that Yaron stay on as an instructor. His successor, Maj.-Gen. Yaakov Amidror, promoted her to chief instructor, in charge of the syllabus at the National Security College. Several times she considered returning to the Foreign Ministry, but the heads of the ministry at the time preferred that she advance in the army.

At the military college, Yaron changed the program, expanded the curriculum in the area of international relations, took students on study trips abroad and developed new learning tracks, such as a doctoral program.

"Most of the instructors in the past came to rest at the college after years in the field, and mostly spent their time coordinating lectures and field trips," relates a female graduate of the college. "Ruthie took the job seriously, and tried to reshape the image of the instructor at the National Security College."

Today, Yaron, who heard about her candidacy for the position of IDF spokesperson by chance – she had not known Ya'alon previously – also serves as the public representative on the committee working to expand the health services covered by the national medical insurance program. She is married to a photographer, Avner, and has a daughter in the army and a son in high school.

Too old?

Writing for The Canadian Jewish News has one ongoing consequence: people call me and suggest topics that I should deal with. What follows is, in fact, based on someone's repeated suggestion.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

This person was looking for a job, and while wandering the streets of downtown Toronto, he saw a sign in a window that said "Help Wanted." He went in and presented himself, hoping to fit the requirements of the position. The manager appeared, took one look at the applicant and said: "Sorry, but you are too old."

Unfortunately, this was just another in a series of occasions when my friend was turned away because of his age. This was not only injurious to his plans, it also violated the Ontario Human Rights Code, and – in his case – it represented a stupid response by the potential employer who, by not using him, lost out on a particularly capable person.

Having myself reached an age that would be considered "too old" for any application I might make for employment, I see the issue as an unfortunate aspect of our social misapprehension that considers certain people as incapable of rendering proper service or of bringing the right amount of energy to the job.

This reflects a common and unfortunate misconception that, in many instances, excludes persons who still have a lot to give and who, by being unable to find proper employment, become casualties of popular prejudice.

In addition to the injury that is dealt to the unsuccessful applicant, in many, if not most, instances, our society is also injured by not using every talent that is available.

At the bottom of all of this is a common prejudice against people who are considered "old," though the person who is considered too old by one may not be by someone else.

I know which category I belong to these days, which is one reason why I am not in the job market. But, were I to apply for a job, I would most likely be rejected as being "too old."

I think the time has come to mark this concept as being not only vague, but also as often being an example of poor judgment.

We usually declare that every person must be taken at his or her worth and capacity, but age seems to be an exception. Too bad, for it makes losers of us all when we apply this social prejudice, for in many, if not most, instances, it is applied poorly and sours our social atmosphere.

Unfortunately, there is usually no one around who will stand up for the person who has been judged "too old." The responsibility to do that belongs to all of us, for it is a social defect to exclude a class of people without looking at their individual capabilities. The individual suffers and so does society. Being old was once a desirable status. For most people, it is no longer.

Looking for a solution

Growing up in North America, I believed that for every problem there is a solution, even if not always an ideal one. But now, after 11 years of living in the Middle East, the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is testing that belief like never before.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

I am not alone. In recent months, many Israelis have come to the conclusion that, for the time being at least, the situation with the Palestinians is hopeless. And, not surprisingly, their confidence in the rest of the Arab world has also hit rock bottom.

Is it possible, despite aspirations to the contrary, that the conflict with the Palestinians cannot be resolved? Could it be that the beliefs, grievances and attitudes on both sides are irreconcilable? Are we locked in one big messy Gordian knot forever? All this, of course, runs counter to what we want to believe and what the peace process was supposed to deliver.

Such thoughts of futility and forsaken dreams are downright depressing – and increasingly common among Israelis. Events of the last few months, to say nothing of the past two years, have convinced people these doubts are more realistic than the feel-good promises of peace agreed to in the Oslo accords of 1993.

Against a background of rampant Islamic fanaticism, the past 21 months of Palestinian atrocities have shaken Israel, darkening most people's view of the future. The terrorist campaign and the vile anti-Semitic incitement in the Palestinian media and schools have left most Israelis deeply disillusioned, dashing their high hopes of the 1990s.

Earlier this month, the Jerusalem Post published the results of two polls that underline some of the seemingly insurmountable obstacles to resolving the conflict. According to the surveys, both Israelis and Palestinians, albeit for different reasons, reject in massive numbers the recent peace proposals espoused by the United States and Saudi Arabia. In the poll of Israeli Jews, only 16 per cent support withdrawal to the 1967 borders in return for a peace deal with the Palestinians and Arab states. The Palestinian poll found that only 24 per cent support such a plan if it did not also include the right of return of Arab refugees to Israel. When that is included in the plan, support among Israeli Jews drops to four per cent. The Post considered the implications of the results important enough to place the findings on its front page.

The polls reflect – and also feed – the country's pessimistic mood. They beg the question whether we are condemned to at least another generation of tensions and hostilities with our Palestinian neighbours. People wonder if the status quo is the best they can expect for the foreseeable future.

As the bloodshed and hatred intensify, the Israeli-Palestinian feud is living up to its image as one of the world's most intractable conflicts. This is no small feat given the other contenders such as Northern Ireland, the Balkans, Korea, Cyprus and Chechnya.

No one really wants to believe that there is no solution. But for all the talk of security fences and separation, neither the Likud nor Labour leaders have come up with a credible way out of the current abyss. In the absence of better days, people take solace however they can. Recently, distant events provided Israelis some dubious consolation, reminding them that as bad as the reality is, it could be much worse.

This month, as India and Pakistan came to the brink of war in their long-simmering dispute over Kashmir, the world had to contemplate the once unthinkable – a nuclear battle on the Asian subcontinent that U.S. military analysts said could kill several million people. With almost perverse relief, Israelis watched India and Pakistan wrestle with the latest flare-up in their seemingly endless feud that has claimed 35,000 lives since 1990.

It is somehow vaguely reassuring to see others embroiled in a dispute perhaps even more volatile, more hate-filled, more drenched in blood and more irresolvable than the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. For a moment, our problems seemed to pale in comparison.

Such facile thinking, of course, gets us nowhere. We remain part of a major dispute in desperate need of a solution, however imperfect. I still want to believe it can be found, even if the reality seems to argue otherwise.

Walking amongst ghosts

Guest Voice

The majesty of eastern Europe! The unique buildings of Prague under renovation after 40 years of communism, the magnificent opulence of imperial Vienna, the breathtaking view of Budapest from the Citadel. And everywhere a graveyard for Jews.

Our Jewish heritage tour of Prague, Vienna and Budapest was deeply meaningful as it revealed to me two Europes, a dual reality, such as I could never have read about or imagined.

It is impossible to visit Prague Castle or the Golden Lane and not be in awe. Prague Castle is one of the great castles of Europe, and the Golden Lane is a street that dates back to the Middle Ages and which once had Franz Kafka as a resident. Yet, minutes away, Theresienstadt inspires a feeling of numbness and a deadening of the soul, as it was a transit camp for Jews destined for the ovens. Theresienstadt also had its own ovens for the 150 a day who died there because of the forced labour and the inhuman living conditions.

Vienna's Kunsthistorisches Museum is an architectural wonder and surely one of the great museums of the world. Schönbrunn Castle is perhaps greater than anything one can see in France. However, one is painfully aware that only a single synagogue in this city that once was home to over 200,000 Jews survived Kristallnacht. And now, if you attend it on Shabbat, it is protected by police with machine guns. Outside Vienna, in a town called Eisenstadt, there stands a hauntingly empty synagogue, memorial to a vanished community.

In Budapest, the parliament building is imposing in size and ornate in its decor. The historic city's Opera House is legendary and the majestic Danube an inspiring sight. There, a Jewish community does survive, with a population of 80,000 and 22 synagogues. But the visitor is all too aware that the Nazi machine worked with terrifying efficiency in Hungary and, in one short year, brutally destroyed 40 per cent of Hungarian Jewry.

Where can one find words to express the feelings? Conflicted? Divided? One is elated in the morning and in the depths of despair in the afternoon. An ordinary tourist at one site and then a witness to tragedy and unspeakable loss at another.

As children from local schools mingled with us in the Holocaust museum in Prague, I wanted to say, "Not all Jewish life is under glass in display cases or under ground represented by Holocaust memorials." Yet I felt like a relic in one of those Jewish museums. A remnant, out of place in that world.

Jews have always been accused of having dual loyalties, but it is the countries of eastern Europe that have parallel societies: one for the general population and another for Jews. We betrayed no one; they betrayed us. Our lost brothers and sisters once drank coffee at those sidewalk cafés and took boxes at the opera. Now, we have no real place there. We are only tourists passing through to the new Jewish reality elsewhere.

The truth strikes home in moments of shocking revelation. Do you know why the tombstones in the Jewish graveyards in those places are so close together, almost on top of one another? Jews lived in defined ghettos with no possibility of expansion. When there was no more place in the graveyard, they had to pile one layer of the dead on another and tombstones accumulated on top as gruesome testimony to the awful truth: in eastern Europe, there was no room, even for the Jewish dead.

We did participate in a small, heart-warming Yom Ha'atzmaut celebration in a square in Prague. Davening in Vienna was awe-inspiring and the community was welcoming. The Dohany synagogue of Budapest is truly spectacular and the cantor who gave us the history of the building was engaging and justifiably proud of his shul.

I have no regrets about our trip. It was an important one and I am truly satisfied to have gone. If more people went on such a personal journey in search of our lost Jewish past, there would be a redoubled commitment to the Jewish life we now enjoy in North America and Israel. Our existence here and in Israel may be threatened as never before, but it is all we have.

The remnants we found in eastern Europe simply cannot compare to the vibrancy, creative life, numbers and resources of Israel and North America. There is no going back. There is no other place. The past instructs us. The ghosts stand guard to remind us. Ghosts do not lie.

The Kirshner File

Allan Zeman - a business force in Hong Kong

Lan Kwai Fong is to Hong Kong what Soho is to London – a magnetic entertainment district. Lonely Planet's authoritative guidebook describes it as Hong Kong's "chief party neighbourhood." An L-shaped area brimming with restaurants, clubs and bars, Lan Kwai Fong is especially popular with tourists and western expatriats.

Sheldon Kirshner in Hong Kong

If there is one person who can take much of the credit for its development, it is Allan Zeman, an ex-Montrealer who has lived here for the past 32 years.

Prior to 1982, Lan Kwai Fong, in the heart of downtown Hong Kong, was a nondescript area of trading companies, warehouses and flower stalls, hardly the vibrant neigbourhood it morphed into thanks to Zeman's vision and enterprise.

Apart from being Lan Kwai Fong's chief promoter, Zeman, 53, is a developer. He owns a raft of buildings in Hong Kong – a former British colony that has been a special administrative region of the People's Republic of China since 1997 – and develops property in Vancouver, B.C.

Zeman also heads up a movie and television production company and a pleasure yacht agency. Although he has not set foot in Montreal for eight years, he sits on the board of Montreal's Algo Group, a publicly-traded fashion conglomerate.

Until a year and a half ago, he was chair of Colby International Group, one of the world's largest supply chain management companies. He sold Colby, which sources apparel in 59 countries, to his main competitor, Li & Fung Limited, for 2.2 billion Hong Kong dollars ($500 million Cdn).

Not bad for a working-class Jewish boy who never bothered with university.

At an interview in his spacious office in Lan Kwi Fong, Zeman came across as an eminently relaxed fellow. Wearing an open necked pale blue shirt, he smiled often and leaned back casually in his chair, as if he did not have a care in the world.

My first question to him was, "What are you doing in a place like Hong Kong?"

His instant reply, complete with a radiant smile, was: "Making money."

Born in Regensburg, Germany, the son of Polish Holocaust survivors, Zeman was raised in Montreal's Cote des Neiges district. His older sister, Rita Goodman, was born in what was the Soviet Union. His parents, Irving and Bella, arrived in Montreal in 1948.

A wholesale merchant, Irving died when Zeman was nine years old. After his untimely death, Bella worked in the Jewish General Hospital to make ends meet. She passed away in Miami Beach six years ago.

Zeman attended Bancroft School and graduated from Northmount High School. "They put me in the 'brain' class, but I was not a great student," he recalled. "I hated to study, but I was street smart. I didn't want to be a professional, a doctor or lawyer. I was a born businessman."

At 11, he began delivering The Gazette in Montreal. "I was making $25 a week plus tips." On weekends, he was a busboy at a steak house, pulling in $20. "I was earning $50 a week, while my friends got by on a $1 allowance." He beamed. "I liked the taste of money."

When he was 16, a classified ad led him to a job as a $50-a-week shipper at a garment manufacturer, Cosmo-Kismet Lingerie. Within a month, he had streamlined its shipping operation. "I was thinking out of the box," he said, a phrase that punctuates Zeman's conversation.

It soon dawned on him that there was more money to be made on the selling side of the rag trade. He landed a position as a showroom salesman at Algo Industries, Canada's premier dress manufacturer. He thrived there. "I did really well. I had the gift of the gab. I developed a good reputation."

Impressed by Zeman's spunk, Algo's president asked him to direct its Western Canada sales team. He was only 19, and already earning an annual income of $50,000. "I learned the ropes at an early age."

When he was 21, he informed his boss he intended to start his own business. Not willing to lose him, Algo made Zeman an offer he could not refuse: president of its import division and a partner to boot. "That brought me to Hong Kong," he said.

The year was 1970.

"It took me about a minute and a half to decide to leave Canada. Everybody looked at me like I had lost my marbles. I thought I'd come out for a few years and move back to Montreal."

In fact, he never looked back. He liked Hong Kong's vibrancy, internationalism and laissez-faire atmosphere. "It was a true business society, and there was an unrivalled energy here."

By exporting womens' sweaters to Canada, Zeman turned a $1 million profit for Algo in his first year in Asia. "I wound up with a lot of money for a young man. I made millions from my first days in Hong Kong. It's considerably more difficult today because Hong Kong is no longer a developing city. Today, if I was starting over again, I'd do it in China."

Lan Kwai Fong, Hong Kong's lively entertainment district.

China, he observed, will have the world's biggest economy in 15 or 20 years. "Trust me on that," he said.

In 1975, he and a British partner formed Colby to source and export apparel to Canada. Colby, which eventually had 36 offices around the globe, was one of the first such outfits to source apparel from the People's Republic of China and to open branches in South Korea, Taiwan and the Philippines.

"I built up Colby to well over $1 billion in volume. Our main market was the United States," said Zeman, who speaks passable Cantonese.

During this period, he got married to his wife, Charmaine, who is from Calgary. They have two children, Jonathan, 25, and Marissa, 23.

Allan Zeman

Lan Kwai Fong jelled into an unstoppable idea 20 years ago, when Zeman realized that far too few western-style restaurants could be found outside hotels. He opened California, his first restaurant, which is still going strong, in a rented building. "Lan Kwai Fong reminded me of Crescent Street in Montreal. I decided it could become another Crescent Street."

Five years after launching California, he paid $40 (Hong Kong) million for what would be the first of 10 buildings in Lan Kwai Fong. By his estimate, it is worth $250 million today.

Zeman soon realized that if he rented space in his building to restaurants rather than companies, he could fetch three times the rent and thereby increase its value. "I slowly began buying up buildings in Lan Kwai Fong, and became the largest landlord in the area."

Of 90 restaurants and clubs in Lan Kwai Fong, 65 rent space from Zeman's Lan Kwai Fong Group. Zeman owns 27 of these outlets outright, from Indochine and Bamboo to Cafe des Artistes and Tokio Joe. There are no Jewish-style restaurants in his chain. "I'm a businessman," he said curtly. "There's no market for it."

In addition, Zeman is the proprietor of two office buildings elsewhere in Hong Kong, where rents can be astronomical, and of an entertainment complex of restaurants and clubs in Shanghai, China. A keen believer in China's future, Zeman is redeveloping Shanghai's legendary Nanjing Road.

Unlike some expats, Zeman never feared China's 1997 takeover of Hong Kong. He was confident that Communist China would live up to its promise of a "one nation, two systems" regime in capitalist Hong Kong.

Not one to rest on his laurels, Zeman, the subject of a recent CNN profile, has diversified his portfolio. He is chairman of Sweetpea Entertainment Inc., which, in December 2000, released the film Dungeons & Dragons. He is also chairman of Mesco Shipyard Limited, which makes yachts, and of DKA Ltd., a public relations company.

Recently, he convinced Hong Kong's government to build a Disneyland theme park on nearby Lantau Island, a project expected to be ready in several years.

With his business interests well in hand, Zeman can afford to devote half his time to public service. He is an advisor to the Hong Kong Tourism Board, the Cultural and Heritage Commission and the Urban Renewal Authority. As well, he is a govenor of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce and the Hong Kong Chamber of Commerce.

He has not immersed himself in local Jewish community affairs. "I'm proud to be Jewish, but religion is not a big part of my life," he explained. "If you're a good person, that's more important."

IWN fights to empower women in Middle East

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The Middle East peace process must include an examination of how women should be treated in a peaceful country, says the chair of the Israel Women's Network (IWN).

"The status of women is an essential part of a democracy," said Rina Bar-Tal at a recent panel sponsored by New Israel Fund, an advocacy group for women's rights.

As someone who has never lived in a peaceful country, Bar-Tal said, "[I don't know] what peace is, or what it means.

"[I do know] that Israel is a complicated country with people from different cultures and different denominations. These aspects need to be added to the peace process. One must remember the cultural problems and differences."

Also on the panel was IWN executive director Ella Gera, who spoke about myths and realities regarding women in Israel.

She said that although women fought next to men in the War of Independence, shortly afterwards men took back control of the military.

Only since 2000, she said, have women been allowed into fighting units. Since legislation was passed that year, 81 per cent of all positions in the army have become open to women, and 0.9 per cent of all women in the army serve in combat units.

But women only serve two years, compared to three for men, "so there is less time for training and less time to network.

"The army is a big socializing force in Israel, and networking while in the army plays an important role in future careers," Gera said.

A myth abounds, she said, that because Golda Meir was prime minister, women enjoy political equality in Israel. "She did little to advance women's status in Israel and [her election to the post] symbolizes a rare occurrence, not a trend.

"The lack of women in public office and the strength of religious parties limit women's struggle for equality, and their ability to influence."

Gera said the current Knesset is the first since the creation of the State of Israel in which the number of women members is greater than in 1948.

"According to statistics from Women in National Parliaments, Israel is no. 53 worldwide in women's representation, compared to South Africa, which is no. 11; Cuba, which is no. 13; and China, which is no. 28."

Women still struggle for all forms of equality, Gera said. Although Israeli women are more highly educated than ever before – more than 50 per cent of university graduates are women – they are underpaid and under-represented in the workforce, she added.

"[Women] played an equal role in the kibbutz movement and in building the State of Israel, but they soon found themselves in traditional roles such as teachers, nurses or kitchen staff. They were not elected to committees that ran the affairs of the kibbutz."

Despite their education, Israeli women are still under-represented in management positions, she said and they are paid less than men. In universities, only eight per cent of professors are women.

Another myth, Gera said, is that Israel has no domestic violence and no poverty.

"Violence is prevalent, and the current situation has increased domestic violence, and violence in general. In 2001, 17 women were murdered, and throughout the country, there are 12 shelters serving 1,600 women annually."

About 14 per cent of all households in Israel fall under the poverty line, and about one quarter of all households run by single women fall under the poverty line.

Gera said the Israel Women's Network believes that empowerment and advocacy are the tools needed to achieve equality for women.

The organization tries to raise awareness in the Israeli and international media about women's issues in Israel, and it acts as a watchdog to ensure fair representation of women in Israeli media. As well, it is Israel's only centre committed to the publication and distribution of information about women.

Canada stokes UN conflict: journalist

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

For more than 50 years, Canada has been complicit in helping stoke Palestinian refugees' aspirations to return to areas that are now part of Israel, creating a "festering problem" and igniting a passionate conflict with Israel, says Israeli researcher and journalist David Bedein.

Through its financial subsidies to refugee camps operated by UNRWA, a UN agency, Canada has helped inflame the Arab-Israeli conflict, Bedein said.

Bedein, who serves as bureau chief for Israel Resource News Agency in Jerusalem, was in Toronto recently where he outlined his views of the Mideast conflict and urged Canadian Jews to question their government's involvement in the UN camps.

David Bedein

UNRWA is funded by 38 countries, including Canada, which contributes $20 million (US) each year. The camps, including "the UNRWA camp in Jenin," are administered by the UN agency and serve as hotbeds of terrorism.

While UNRWA operates schools, medical clinics and distributes food supplements, "it is supposed to administer the camps from A to Z" and should prevent terrorist activities there. When he confronted UNRWA officials about the presence of terrorist cells, "he said, 'they have to sleep somewhere,'" Bedein related.

Bedein has researched the educational curriculum taught in the camps' schools and viewed the local maps presented to Palestinian children. They all instill a desire to return to Arab villages that are now part of Israel, he said.

Since Israel and the PLO signed the Oslo Agreement in 1993, "they were told that in [the year] 2000 they will go back to their homes."

Bedein rejected suggestions that the current conflict is focused on Israeli settlements in Judea, Samaria or Gaza. In 1958, he said, Israeli diplomat Abba Eban wrote a seminal article arguing the UNRWA camps were a dagger in the heart of Israel. In 1964, U.S. Jews protested a mural at the Jordanian pavilion at the New York World's Fair which demanded the right of return. The PLO, which was founded in 1964, three years before Israel seized the territories, was based on the idea of the right of return, he said.

Bedein said his agency has interviewed four UNRWA commissioners and they each "acknowledged they support the right of return, as that's their mandate."

When he met with Canadian diplomatic officials in Ramallah, "they looked me straight in the punim (face) and when I asked about the right of return, they gave me a one-sentence answer: 'You can't expect them to forfeit their right of return.'"

Bedein noted the "right of return" is based on UN resolution 194, a General Assembly resolution that does not confer legal rights. Nevertheless, "you have an agency (UNRWA) that is based on that mandate. The issue is not legality, it's appropriateness. My view is that everyone should be questioning this issue.

"When the Canadian government is being asked for money, in light of everything that's happened to date, when Israel discovers that the terror network operating versus Israel is from UNRWA refugee camps, I ask a very simple question: Isn't it logical for donor nations to ask UNRWA to disarm the camps?"

Bedein said one of the reasons for his visit to Toronto, as well as to several U.S. destinations, was to raise funds for a film on the UN camps, which he hopes to market to major television networks.

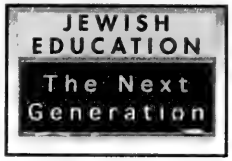
WE WISH OUR GRADUATING CLASS CONTINUED SUCCESS IN THEIR FUTURE EDUCATION

Jewish Life

Car pool education

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

Rabbi Meir says: "Do not look at the vessel, but what is in it" (Pirkei Avot, 5:27). This simple but true teaching would be well applied to how we think of our own children and those of others, and to the recognition of the potential within each one. What is especially disturbing in many instances is the slotting and instant judging of Jewish children depending on which day school they attend, or if they go to a Jewish school at all.



On one level, this is understandable. Parents make judgments about suitable friends for their younger children often based on perceptions of similar religious and cultural sensibilities. But these categorizations can lead to overly restrictive discernments about what kind of child is in front of me; often the reality is the reverse of common opinion. For example, there is no necessary equation that can be made between a child's level of friendliness, ethical behaviour, maturity level, psychological soundness, capacity for love, moral goodness and inherent spiritual abilities, and, on the other hand, their level of religious observance or Torah knowledge. Sometimes, quite the opposite is the case.

All the educational benefits of learning Torah remain largely theoretical until they have been properly processed and internalized by the child's whole personality. Indeed, the Talmud is replete with examples of great Torah scholars slipping up in their treatment of others, their voluminous command of Jewish texts notwithstanding.

Although Jewish education has made great strides in the last number of years in exposing kids to the rich heritage of Jewish sources and practices, I sometimes wonder if we haven't missed the forest for the trees. What are we trying to produce at the end of the day – children who have amassed large swaths of Jewish information, or future adults who will inspire others with their beautiful display of Jewish ethical sensitivity and compassion for other people?

In various car-pool episodes over the years, I have witnessed multiple examples of children coming home from their Torah studies for the day and manifesting all sorts of rudeness and discourteous conduct. It leads to a lot of head-scratching and postfacto chagrin, at least for me. What was the point of three hours of Talmud and Chumash today? Is it all just a game, or do we want our children to really feel the moral life in their bones?

Inevitably, much of this behaviour must be traced to parental example, an influence that no amount of textual learning can undo. If we wish our hard earned tuition dollars to really pay dividends in the form of children who embody the qualities of goodness and spiritual power that we pray for them to acquire, then it is incumbent on all parents to see our own ethical stance as a profound instance of informal Jewish education.

In the Talmudic discussion regarding which is the higher calling – study or the life of action – study is privileged for the ironic reason that it leads to action. Put another way, how we drive during car pool, or even how we park, may ultimately register more with our kids than that day's regimen of Torah verses.

Priests and rabbis meet to strengthen bonds

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The goal of the recent third annual meeting of priests and rabbis was to make each religion real in the eyes of the other, said Rev. Damian MacPherson, one of the organizers.

"There is a great need for us to be together and to support one another. Our task is to strengthen our bonds," said Rev. MacPherson, director of Ecumenism and Interfaith Affairs, for the Roman Catholic Archdiocese of Toronto.

The theme of the half-day meeting, held at St. Gabriel's Parish, was bar/bat mitzvah and the sacrament of confirmation.

In discussing the coming-of-age ceremonies, all participants stressed the need for parental involvement and co-operation between home, school and the religious institution.

Too many people view the bar/bat mitzvah as an end of religious schooling, said Rabbi Michal Shekel, associate rabbi at Temple Har Zion. "They tend to focus on freedom from study. We try to show them that it is the beginning of their studies.

"[This is where] parental attitude becomes very important," she said.

The goal of the bar/bat mitzvah, said Rabbi Shekel, is to produce an individual who wants to become part of a vibrant community. "When we lose students after their bar/bat mitzvah, we produce adults that have an adolescent sense of religion."

More important than the affect a bar/bar mitzvah can have on a child, she said, is the potential affect it can have on parents. "They can observe how their child is changing and growing, and this can strengthen their own commitment to the community. The experience can go beyond the child, and onto the family as well."

Rabbi Joseph Kelman, rabbi emeritus of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, said the bar/bat mitzvah gives youth an educational goal. "The bar mitzvah is one way to educate the child. We have a different picture of Judaism because of the bar/bat mitzvah. It is a way of communicating to the child to carry forward.

> 'Great need to support one another'

"Parents are an important part of the intergenerational transfer, because the bar mitzvah is also important to their own parents," he said.

John Zurakowski, from the Catholic Office of Religious Education, said it is also a challenge for the Catholic Church to keep youth committed to the religious community after confirmation, which takes place around age 13.

"Confirmation is a great time for the whole family to look at its faith and view the ceremony as larger than a one-day celebration," he said.

Stuart Schoenfeld, a professor of sociology at York University who has done a sociological study on bar/bat mitzvahs, said that after the ceremony, it's up to the child to choose his or her level of Jewish commitment.

"For some children it might mean increased Jewishness, while others [might] count the hours spent in the Jewish sector.

"[The bar/bat mitzvah] is a rite of passage into an uncertain future. The parents and child are together at the event, but then they separate," said Schoenfeld.

The candle-lighting ceremony that is part of many bar/bat mitzvah parties, which generally starts with family members and moves on to peers, depicts the pattern of movement a youth takes, he said. "The child is entering a stage of life in which they depend less on their parents. This is acknowledging that transition."

Rabbi Roy Tanenbaum of Beth Tzedec Congregation said this growth process may bring with it an element of betrayal.

"A bar/bat mitzvah is a bittersweet event. We celebrate the event, but we have fears about where the child will go from there.We want the child to carry on Jewishly, but we have no control.

"[A parent's] Judaism may change because a new generation will take over and change things. It could be a betrayal," he said.

Jewish Life

A modern rendering of Jesus

Testament*, by Nino Ricci, Doubleday Canada, 2002, $35.95

Books
Bernard Baskin

A multitude of books have been written about Jesus, about every aspect of his life and ministry. Yet we know very little about him as a historic personality. The four accounts of his life in the Christian Scriptures are tendentious and contradictory. The often quoted reference from Josephus is probably a Christian interpolation, and the comments about him in the Talmud are fragmentary and polemical.

In his autobiography, Challenging Years, Rabbi Stephen Wise wrote: "Jesus was a Jew, Hebrew of Hebrews. Whatever I believe with respect to the imputed miracle of his birth, his mother, Mary, was a Jewish woman. He was reared and taught as a Jew. He worshipped in the synagogue. He spoke no language save Hebrew. He did not teach or wish to teach a new religion."

The widely respected Orthodox rabbi, David De Sola Pool, who served as spiritual leader of the oldest synagogue in New York City (Shearith Israel), once stated: "As a Jew Jesus lived a fully Jewish life and observed the ritual prescriptions of the Torah... the religion which he preached and practised was almost without exception Pharisaic Judaism. The classical Pharisaic understanding of the Scriptures and moral teaching had a profound influence on the Sermon on the Mount."

Yet, the major teachings of Jesus – no matter how Jewish their origin and outlook – have been difficult for most Jews to separate from a church that through history has made his name a club against Judaism and the cross a symbol of terror and destruction.

Nino Ricci is a talented Toronto author whose best-selling Lives of the Saints (1990) won the Governor General's Award for fiction. Now, in Testament, he has undertaken the formidable task of telling the life story of Jesus in a new way for modern readers.

The Jesus of this book is not divine. He is the bastard child of Mary, who had been raped by a Roman officer. His miracles are explained in a non-supernatural manner, and Ricci draws on Christian apocryphal texts as well as modern biblical scholarship for his multi-dimensional portrait.

The structure of the novel closely mirrors that of the Gospels. There are four accounts of Jesus's life: by his mother Mary, by Judas, by Mary Magdalene and by a gentile peasant called Simon of Gergesa, modelled after the figure of John.

These interlocking accounts are filled with absorbing detail and attempt, with some success, to view Jesus through the eyes of his contemporaries. Unhappily, the voices of those who tell their stories are not sufficiently differentiated. They sound pretty much alike. Only Mary offers a unique depiction of her complex relationship with her son, which involves her own mixed emotions, growing fears and constant vulnerability.

Ricci takes his place with such previous authors as Sholem Asch, Joseph Klausner, Robert Graves, Norman Mailer, Anthony Burgess and many others who have tried to make the brief ministry of Jesus and his teachings alive and relevant for our age.

The subject matter of this well-researched novel is, of course, suffused with emotion and controversy. It has been both praised and denounced. All and all, Testament is a considerable achievement – provocative, intelligent and well-written.

How to help Israel – Part 3

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Today, we conclude with our series on what you can do to help Israel by using the resources of the World Wide Web.

1) Say a prayer

Michael Freund, a former deputy director of communications and policy planning in Israel's Prime Minister's Office, says, "The usual array of pro-Israel activities – contacting one's elected representatives, combating media bias or even writing a check – just doesn't seem to cut it anymore... Israel should launch an international campaign, Operation Shield of David, which would bring together Jews [and others] to pray on the country's behalf. The Book of Psalms [Tehillim], written by King David, has always been one of the most potent weapons in Israel's spiritual arsenal. It is time to dust off this powerful tool, and to let its words of comfort and succor resonate across the globe" [http://www.torah.org/features/spirfocus/bestdefense.html].

The Orthodox Union [http://www.ou.org/israel/5762/whatyoucando.htm] recommends reciting Tehillm daily, especially chapters 20, 83, 142 and 121 ("I will lift up mine eyes unto the mountains: from whence shall my help come?"). You can find Tehillim online in English and Hebrew at Breslav.com, if you have Hebrew fonts installed [http://www.breslov.com/bible/Psalms.htm]. You can also encourage your synagogue or temple to recite the prayer for the well-being of Israel's soldiers [http://www.ou.org/yerushalayim/prayers2.htm].

And even if you cannot make it to Israel, you can still place a note in the Western Wall. The Aish HaTorah Web site allows you to type in a message that will be printed out in Jerusalem and placed in the wall. There is no charge for this confidential service [http://www.aish.com/wallcam/Place_a_Note_in_the_Wall.asp].

2) Buy Israeli products

Israel exports high quality foods and other products that you can purchase locally or over the web. You'll find a very large directory at the Orthodox Union Web site [http://www.ou.org/programs/5762/buyisrael.htm].

3) Invest in Israel

If you are considering investing in Israel, take a look at the Ministry of Industry and Trade's English language Web site [http://www.moit.gov.il/tamas_en.asp]. This large site has information about business development in Israel, the country's economy, research and development, the Israel Export Institute and many ministry publications.

And don't forget about the investment that is almost as old as the State of Israel: Israel Bonds. In May of 1951, prime minister David Ben-Gurion launched the first Israel Bond sales drive in the United States. Israel Bonds have been instrumental in the growth of the country ever since [http://www.israelbonds.com/].

4) Make Aliyah

Between 1948 and 2000, 2.8 million Jews immigrated to Israel, including over 100,000 North Americans [http://www.wzo.org.il/en/resources/view.asp?id=434]. There is a great deal of information on the web that will help you with your decision. You'll find links to all the important sites at Jacob Richman's Aliyah Pages [http://www.jr.co.il/aliyah/].

Of course, the decision to move to Israel involves much more than facts and figures. Sol Jakubowicz and his family moved to Israel from Toronto four years ago... and haven't looked back [http://www.aish.com/jewishissues/israeldiary/Still_Crazy_Why_We_Made_Aliyah.asp]:

"It is time for every Jew to stand up and be counted. To make the statement that regardless of where we live right now, Eretz Israel is our destiny, and that we will be intimately, personally involved in her rebuilding. To show the world that we still care. To show the world that we do really believe in what we are praying for. To show the world that we really believe our dreams will come true."

Jewish poverty a pressing issue at JF & CS meeting

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Unlike the other volunteers who spoke at Jewish Family & Child Service's annual general meeting, "Chaplain Mike" says his volunteerism makes him feel terrible.

"I come home depressed and heartbroken," he said last week at the Wagman Centre.

Mike, who goes only by his first name when visiting Jewish prison inmates and patients in mental health institutions, was one of three JF&CS volunteers who spoke as part of the meeting at the Wagman Centre.

Alberto Quiroz talked about the rewards of being a Big Brother, and Alison Cohen noted the joy and satisfaction she derives tutoring adolescents at the J.D. Diamond Adolescent Centre.

But when it comes to volunteering with prison inmates, "people ask 'Why do you want to help this scum?' " said Mike, a tall man with a solid build and bluff manner.

"When I visit the murderers, wife beaters, drug traffickers, breakers and enterers, I see them on one side, and you and I on the other, separated only by circumstance. There's a very fuzzy line that any of us are capable of crossing given the circumstances."

Mike believes it's important to give some indication the Jewish world has not forgotten these Jews. It's incumbent on everyone to try to make the world a better place, he said.

During the meeting, which was dedicated to honouring the agency's volunteers, JF&CS executive director Gordon Wolfe said people often volunteer because they are searching for meaning or as a way of connecting with themselves, other people and their community.

"Why don't more people volunteer?" he asked. "We get excited that one third of all Canadians volunteer. Although that's impressive, where the hell are the other 67 percent?"

Among the issues JF&CS deals with on a daily basis are poverty, child abuse, domestic violence, homelessness, and diminishing opportunities for those who are disadvantaged, said agency president Cecile Zaifman.

Much of the past year has been spent on strategic planning for the agency's next three to five years, she said. The new plan is based on three priorities: reaffirming a focus on prevention and wellness; continuously improving and building capacity to enhance efficiency and effectiveness; and enhancing funding sources.

Another impending change is Wolfe's retirement, planned for June 2003, Zaifman announced.

The agency, which is more than 130 years old, receives most of its funding from the Ministry of Community and Social Services, United Way and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Its annual $12 million budget has almost doubled in the last decade, but years of flat or decreasing revenues have taken their toll as costs have risen, Zaifman said.

"Our resources are being taxed like never before," said Wolfe, who noted also that the agency has no deficits.

Jewish poverty is a particularly pressing issue. "We must not ignore it, even if it's largely hidden from our view," said Wolfe.

The situation has become worse over the past decade, and in Toronto in general, single parents were hardest hit, even though more of them were working and employment earnings were higher, he noted. Child poverty in the city grew by an additional 14,310 children and youth during the economic recovery years of the late 1990s, he added.

The median income of single parent families living in poverty in 1999 in Toronto was $10,100, less than the annual rent of an appropriate-sized apartment, he offered as an example.

In the last six months alone, said Wolfe, the number of JF&CS clients receiving financial assistance increased from 35 percent to 46 percent of total cases. "By definition, these people are living at the poverty level."

Terror has to be destroyed, says Israeli rabbi

By ADAM GRACHNIK
CJN Intern

"Do we want to go back to the desert, to the jungle of exile?" asked Rabbi Eliezer Waldman at the Beth Avraham Yoseph Synagogue in Thornhill. "We have no choice. We have to fight, we have to be strong, we have to build [and] we have to be pioneers."

Rabbi Waldman, the founder of the Techiya Party and the founder and rosh yeshiva of Yeshivat Nir in Kiryat Arba, where he lives, was in town speaking about the situation in the suburb of Hebron, which is just minutes from the Cave of Machpela (Tomb of the Patriarchs) and home to 6,000 Jews.

Rabbi Waldman began his speech by referring to the time the Jewish people were slaves in Egypt, saying he hoped they wouldn't become slaves again. He then condemned what he called "enemies of the Jewish people" by claiming that "there is no room for a Palestinian state, it would be a terrorist state... terror has to be destroyed and will be destroyed.

"Knowing the desire [and] the intention of our enemies... Being aware of the awakening of anti-Semitism [and] Jewish hatred... The world isn't ready to accept the reality of Jewish independence, of the Jews having their own independent state and their independent army," he told the audience of about 100 people.

"[There are] lies, twisting of facts of history, not only by our enemies who are trying to destroy us, but [by] those in the UN," he said, condemning the United Nations. "The only thing they [UN] are united against is the Jewish people."

Rabbi Waldman added, "Why, when Jews are killed or in danger nobody cares?"

Why, "when Jews defend themselves, there are investigative committees formed?" he asked, referring to the fact-finding mission originally organized, then cancelled, by the United Nations to investigate IDF actions in Jenin.

The rabbi suggested American foreign policy was hypocritical and offered strong words for U.S. President George W. Bush.

"[Mr. Bush] is demanding from us flexibility, compromise and negotiations. Whereas Mr. Bush wants to fight terror and declares no negotiations and no compromise," he said.

"No one has a right to rebuke us, no one has a right to say a word about how we defend ourselves," Rabbi Waldman said. "But they [United States] will tell us, when [we] can defend yourselves. How [we] can defend ourselves. Where [we] can settle, where [were] not allowed to settle, [they] will decide what are illegal settlements."

"[There are] no such things as illegal Jewish settlements in Israel," he said passionately.

Rabbi Waldman also spoke of liberating "the heart of Israel" during the Six Day War, and claimed that "any nation that interferes with us [Israel] will fall apart."

Rabbi Waldman said Israel has two major enemies – the evident external enemies, such as the Arab world, and the internal enemies like "his brothers on the left," whom he said are weak because they feel they have no choice but to compromise and make peace.

"We will continue to go on and inherit the land," he said. "We will continue to travel the roads, we will continue to build and settle in Israel.

"We will continue to bear children, we will continue to establish yeshivot, we will continue to educate, have faith, because we will not anymore run away," he said, asking in his final sentence for "you [the audience] to be with us."

Fisher's voice heals victims of violence in Israel

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Toronto singer Ritasue Charlstein Fisher, known in Israel simply as Rita, travelled to the country recently to perform for victims of the intifadah.

The singer and storyteller, who has performed for wounded Israeli soldiers for more than 20 years, says she went there to try to bring some joy through her music to injured civilians and soldiers.

"I was driven to connect to victims of terror attacks at a time when Israel feels abandoned," she said.

"I needed to reach out and touch these people. God has given me the gift of voice and I felt a need to use that gift to heal people in terrible pain."

Observing Yom Hazikaron and Yom Ha'atzmaut in Israel, she said, "was celebrating joy and experiencing grief."

Almost immediately after her plane landed, she heard of the April 12 Machane Yehuda suicide bombing.

"As I drove to Jerusalem, on one hand, I was sickened by the devastation, and on the other, I knew this was the right time to be in Israel."

For the next 10 days, Fisher travelled to hospitals and military camps across the country singing, talking and bringing comfort to victims. She was frequently accompanied by disabled soldiers to whom she had previously sung and who now wish to help others who have been wounded.

Fisher spoke of her visit to a woman who was injured in the Passover bomb blast at the Natanya Park Hotel and of her visit to the wounded son of a Christian minister whose parents had moved to Israel 30 years ago and whose 15 children had all served in the Israel Defence Forces.

Fisher also sang for an 18-year-old boy who was studying at a yeshiva in Atzmona in Gaza before going into the army. As he sat studying, two Palestinian gunmen came in and started shooting. Eight boys were killed and he and a number of others were seriously injured.

On her visit to see another victim in Ranaana's Beit Levenstein Hospital, Fisher was accompanied by Adam Greenfeld, whom she had entertained in the hospital 10 years before while he was recovering from a serious injury.

"Adam is a symbol of courage for although he cannot walk, he embraces life with every fibre of his being," she said. "And now he is helping others overcome their grief."

They were going to visit Sharon Mammon, who was still lying in a coma in the Ranaana hospital four months after nails entered his heart and his brain in last December's Ben Yehuda Street suicide bombing.

Fisher sang to Mammon for half an hour, and then took his hand and said, "Show me a sign that you know I sang for you." To the surprise of his mother and others in the room, Mammon blinked an eye and smiled. It was his first response to any stimulus since his injury.

"That was the miracle and I now knew why I was sent to Israel," Fisher said. "The nurses said I unblocked him. And when I returned the next day again, he gave me a smile and attempted to kiss me."

Since her return to Toronto, Fisher has spoken each week to Mammon's mother, who puts the phone to Mammon's ear as Fisher speaks to him. His mother has told Fisher that Mammon is beginning to move his hand and say a few words.

"You brought him out of his darkness," she said.

Greenfeld has also thanked Fisher for her help. In a letter he wrote to her in Hebrew, he described how he felt the first time she came to his bedside to sing in Tel Hashomer Hospital just after his injury.

". . . "For the first time since my injury, I cried from the bottom of my heart. From that moment, I knew that my soul had connected to yours, and today we are dear friends, in spite of an ocean between us."

Fisher intends to go back to Israel again one day to heal others.

"I look forward to returning to Israel to continue my labour of love and also to share my stories and songs with the Jewish community here in Toronto and beyond," she said.

Singer and storyteller Ritasue Fisher performed at the Israeli army base for reservists in Har Gilo. The soldiers serve in Beit Jala and Kalkilya.

Labour group criticizes Israel

In an open letter to the Canadian labour movement, McDermott said: "A sick, bigoted mentality is seeping into Canadian labour. I cannot understand how freedom-loving Canadians would be drawn to admire the terrorist demagogue, Yasser Arafat. It is completely beyond my comprehension to see intelligent, progressive, Canadian trade unionists expressing affinity with a proven corrupt, immoral, autocratic leader, totally lacking integrity."

McDermott suggested anti-Semitism may be rearing its head in the labour movement. "Given a convenient pretext, it can suddenly erupt spewing its malicious pent-up venom in all directions."

CLC president Kenneth Georgetti rejected suggestions the CLC is anti-Semitic. Responding to a recent column in the Globe and Mail, Georgetti noted the CLC has condemned attacks on synagogues and hateful graffiti on Jewish institutions in Toronto and Ottawa.

But critics of the CLC argue the resolution and policy statement are simple-minded and ignorant of Middle East history.

> 'Statement simple-minded and ignorant of Middle East history'

Among the areas that came in for criticism:

• the policy statement's contention that "Israel has been declared by the UN as an illegal occupying power" and that Israel occupation came as a result of "military conquest and it has been repeatedly condemned by the UN."

• the comparison of Israel to apartheid South Africa.

• the suggestion that the Israeli army wantonly enters Palestinian areas, destroys homes and orchards "and justifies it with 'hunting down terrorists.' "

• the drawing of a "moral equivalence" and the CLC's equal condemnation of Palestinian terrorist attacks and Israel's military responses to them.

Congress representative Simon Rosenblum monitored the CLC convention. He met with union leaders in an effort to persuade them to amend the documents' harshest language. Following passage of the CLC resolution, he said the union statements drew "incredibly simple-minded parallels" between Israel and South Africa.

"If they deliberate on foreign policy, they ought to take the responsibility of knowing what they talk about," he said. "Whenever they put pen to paper, they get it wrong in a factual sense, they get it wrong in a moral sense."

Lawyer Shalom Schachter, a union member for 21 years, attended the triennial CLC convention. A delegate of the National Union of Public and General Employees, Schachter said his trip to Vancouver was arranged hastily after he learned the CLC would be considering CUPE Ontario's earlier resolution.

Schachter met with union leaders as well as rank-and-file members, and found a receptive ear among some delegates. However, "coming into it at the last minute, it's hard to change the momentum. Had we started earlier in the [resolution drafting] cycle, we would've gotten the interested member and leaders an alternative."

Schachter said that in the horse-trading that goes on at conventions – you vote for my resolution and I'll vote for yours – little could be done to change the outcome. However, he did claim one success. The resolution adopted by the convention's 3,000 delegates did not include the statement on apartheid. That was passed only by the executive committee and council, a much smaller body.

He suggested supporters of Israel must make greater efforts to attend conventions and take part in the drafting of resolutions and the subsequent lobbying for them.

The Palestinian community was well represented and organized at the convention, he said. In addition, a representative of the Palestinian trade union movement attended the convention but there was no counterpart from Israeli labour.

At one point in its history, Schachter said, Canadian labour was sympathetic to Israel, partly because of close ties between it and the Histadrut, Israel's labour federation. In addition, some unions, such as garment workers, had a strong Jewish presence.

But the Histadrut was not represented at this year's convention and most Jewish workers are now employed in white-collar jobs and are less active in labour movement politics, Schachter said.

The CLC, meanwhile, was effectively lobbied by pro-Palestinian delegates and seems to have accepted the media's depiction of a David-and-Goliath struggle, he said.

In addition, many in labour have adopted a "knee-jerk anti-American reaction. There is a legitimate reason for this reaction, as the United States is generally an anti-union society that makes it hard to organize and it take actions abroad that make it harder to unionize." For some, "the enemy of my enemy is my friend and since the U.S. [has an] alliance with Israel, then Israel gets tarred as well," Schachter said.

Congress president Keith Landy was particularly angry at the CLC's use of the apartheid analogy.

"The apartheid images they're conjuring up are right out of the Durban anti-Semitic resolutions, that were adopted subsequently by the UN in its anti-Israel resolutions," he said.

Rosenblum said that while the resolution has no immediate practical effect, "it speaks in the name of Canadian labour, which is a major part of Canadian society."

"As we fight the battle for public opinion on this, it is not a good sign. It does not help in our advocacy with the government. None of this is good, but the sky is not falling."

Reflections on Israel's constitutional revolution

By ADAM DODEK

Ten years ago, the Knesset passed a number of laws that ushered in a constitutional revolution in Israel. Here in Canada, we are celebrating the 20th anniversary of our own constitutional revolution. The Canadian and Israeli constitutional experiences are strongly intertwined, a phenomenon that becomes all the more difficult to fathom given the current state of upheaval in Israel that is so foreign to our everyday experience in this country.

Aharon Barak, chief justice of Israel's Supreme Court

In Canada, we have always had a formal constitution; not so in Israel. The Israeli constitutional void was not by design, however. The UN Partition Resolution of November 1947, which called for the creation of a Jewish and an Arab state, mandated that they each adopt democratic constitutions. This was, after all, the beginning of the post-Holocaust flourishing of international law and constitutional bills of rights. After the Holocaust, the UN adopted the Universal Declaration of Human Rights whose purpose is spelled out in its title: all persons, regardless of under what government they live, are entitled to certain basic rights. In addition, in 1948, the adoption of a constitution was seen simply as one of the trappings of statehood, like a flag or an anthem. Enacting a constitution was simply one item on the "to do list" for newly independent states after World War II.

Thus, the Jewish community in Palestine responded to the Partition Resolution by beginning to prepare a constitution. The Jewish Agency commissioned an expert, Leo Kohn, to prepare a draft. Other organizations did the same.

When the State of Israel was born on May 14, 1948, Israel's Declaration of Independence promised that a constituent assembly would be elected with the task of enacting a constitution no later than Oct. 1, 1948. After the War of Independence broke out, this deadline came and went with no constituent assembly and no constitution. The provisional government of the new state did strike a constitutional committee that debated the substance of a future constitution. But when a constituent assembly was finally elected in January 1949, it did not adopt a constitution but rather converted itself into the First Knesset and decided that Israel's constitution would be built chapter upon chapter in a collection of Basic Laws.

Israel failed to adopt a constitution in its early years for two reasons. First, the religious-secular divide was a serious obstacle to the adoption of a constitution, both then and now. Second, the state's first prime minister, David Ben-Gurion, became Israel's anti-Trudeau, a staunch opponent to the constitutional enterprise, which he viewed as hampering the government's free hand in state-building.

By 1992, the year Canadians were celebrating the Charter's 10th anniversary, Israel had adopted nine Basic Laws. These Basic Laws resembled Canada's old BNA Act in that they focused on government – specifically, on the institutions and machinery of government. Israel had no "People's Package" – no Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Like Canada, though, Israel's judges had developed a very extensive "judicial bill of rights" even without any specific laws or constitutional provisions on subjects such as freedom of speech, freedom of association and equality.

This changed in 1992. In March of that year, in the waning days of an Israeli parliament focused on June elections, the Knesset passed the first two Basic Laws on individual rights – the Basic Law: Human Dignity and Freedom and the Basic Law: Freedom of Occupation. These Basic Laws were modelled on the Canadian charter – not in their substance, but in their form. Indeed, two years later, after the Supreme Court of Israel ruled that the Basic Law: Freedom of Occupation did not allow the government to prohibit the import of non-kosher meat, the Knesset again looked to Canada. This time it plucked the notwithstanding clause from the Canadian charter and inserted it into the Basic Law: Freedom of Occupation, and then invoked it to enable the continued restriction on importing treif.

Values of truth, mercy and compassion are incorporated in the new Supreme Court building in Jerusalem.

It was the enactment of these laws that prompted Supreme Court of Israel president Aharon Barak to declare a "constitutional revolution" in Israel. However, the title of a well-known book on the making of the Canadian charter – And No One Cheered – would be more apropos of the Israeli enactment of these two new Basic Laws. There were no parliamentary hearings or referenda before these Basic Laws were passed – just a half-empty Knesset chamber, many of whose 120 members were more concerned about primaries and upcoming elections than would-be constitutional revolutions. The two laws were passed by votes of 32-21 and 23-0.

Truth be told, these two new Basic Laws did not radically alter the Israeli legal or political landscape. An increasingly activist Israeli Supreme Court did not require additional tools to strike down political decisions. It had been doing so since the mid-1950s and with ever-increasing assertiveness in the late 1980s and early 1990s. The more important change in Israeli society occurred with the passage of the third Basic Law in March 1992 which changed the electoral system to provide for the direct election of the prime minister.

As observers of Israeli politics know, elections for the Knesset are based on a pure proportional representation. Under the old system, the leaders of the party who commanded a majority in parliament became prime minister. Under the new system, Israelis cast two ballots, one for the Knesset and one for the prime minister. The results of this split vote has been the demise of the Labour and Likud parties. In the 1980s, Israeli politics was characterized by electoral deadlock between Labour and Likud, resulting in successive National Unity governments where the two parties collectively controlled between two-thirds and three-quarters of the Knesset seats.

By 1999, after the second direct election for the prime minister, these two parties could not even muster a majority of Knesset seats between them. The once-mighty Labour alignment had fallen to 27 seats by 1999, and the Likud coalition that Ariel Sharon had worked so hard to build in the 1970s was reduced to just 19 seats, only two more than the third-place party, Shas. This is the real constitutional revolution in Israel that has occurred over the past 10 years.

The psychology of the double ballot was simple and predictable, but it was ignored. Under the old system, where the leader of the party who commanded the allegiance of a majority in the Knesset became the prime minister, voters had to weigh their more particularist concerns – in religious, ethnic or single-issue party – with their desire to see Menachim Begin, Shimon Peres, Yitzhak Shamir or Yitzhak Rabin become prime minister. With the double ballot, the voter was suddenly freed of such internal tussles. New immigrants could cast a vote for one of a number of Russian parties and for the prime ministerial candidate of their choice. Ditto for environmentalists, the Sephardim, pensioners, men's rights advocates, etc. The result was that there was no incentive to vote for the Labour or Likud party so that their leader would become prime minister.

The net result of direct election of the prime minister has been that instead of making the prime minister more independent, it has made him more beholden than ever to his coalition partners. In fact, the opportunities for small parties to influence the prime minister have only increased under the new system. Prime ministerial candidates need to seek support from other parties before the balloting, between the first and subsequent rounds of balloting if no prime ministerial candidate gets 50 per cent of the vote in the first round, after the direct election of the prime minister when he is charged with forming a government, and during the maintenance of the directly elected prime minister's coalition government.

Realizing the effect of this constitutional revolution, the Knesset repealed the law for the direct election of the prime minister in March of last year. The next elections to the Knesset will take place under the old single ballot system. It remains to be seen to what extent Labour and the Likud will be able to rebuild themselves. Once unleashed, can the revolution be rolled back?

The ease with which the Knesset ushered in the constitutional revolution and now attempts to repeal it demonstrates another strange aspect of Israel's constitution. In building its constitution chapter upon chapter in Basic Laws, Israel has no Basic Laws on Basic Laws – no rules of the game for constitutional change. In Canadian parlance, Israel lacks an amending formula. Basic Laws can be enacted by a simple majority of Knesset members who happen to be present in any given parliamentary session. They can be amended or repealed in the same manner. Whereas the Canadian constitution is too difficult to amend, the Israeli constitution is far too easy to alter.

It is difficult to give much thought to Israel's constitutional revolution when suicide bombers are blowing themselves up in the very cafés where Israelis might debate such issues. However, the deeper one looks at the issue, the more relevant the constitutional revolution becomes. On a practical basis, the manner in which Prime Minister Sharon is able to respond to this and indeed any crisis, is a function of the constitutional revolution brought about by the law for the direct election of the prime minister.

Prime minister more beholden than ever to his coalition partners

On a more abstract level, a nation's constitution represents an expression of its most fundamental values. While it is unlikely that many will celebrate the 10th anniversary of the Basic Law: Human Dignity and Freedom and the Basic Law: Freedom of Occupation, perhaps they should. For it is in the idea of protecting human dignity and freedom that one finds the raison d'être for Israel's establishment, its defence and its future.

Adam Dodek is a Toronto lawyer and a former Fulbright Scholar in Israeli constitutional law who has clerked at the Supreme Court of Israel.

Father soldiers on after son's death

By REUVEN ROSENFELDER

On Feb 20 at four o'clock in the morning, Ezra and Nurit Eini of Petach Tikvah heard a knock on the door. Representatives of the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) had arrived with a shattering message: their youngest child, Moshe, 22, was one of six Israeli soldiers killed a few hours earlier in a Palestinian terror attack on an IDF roadblock known as Ein Ariq, west of Ramallah in the West Bank.

"In a split-second, life is turned upside down," says Ezra, an Israeli tour guide known to literally thousands of Canadian Jews who have visited Israel on community missions over the years.

Barely three weeks later, Ezra is seated on a couch in the lobby of the Inbal (formerly the Laromme) Hotel in Jerusalem, talking to a reporter for the first time since his son's death.

The place is nearly deserted, due to a lack of tourists. But Ezra is about to begin a day of touring with a family from Houston, Tex. They had sent him a fax, not knowing what had happened, asking for his services as a guide on their visit to the country.

'Visitors see Israel through our eyes and our mouths'

With his son in mind, Ezra says he made the decision to return to work as soon a possible. "Because Moshe loved life so much, our family made a decision to pick ourselves up from the ground."

Nurit, a high-school teacher in Ramat Gan, also made a quick return to her classroom. Her students are 17 and 18 years old and are themselves about to begin military service in these tough times. For the first two days after she returned, they just talked for hours, teacher and students.

The Einis have two older children, Shmuel and Yael. Both served as officers in the IDF, like Moshe, who advanced to the rank of captain by the time of his death. He was affectionately known as "Moishale."

Ezra's connection with Canada was made through Victor Yagoda, missions director at the Israel Office of the United Israel Appeal of Canada. Since the mid-1980's, Ezra has guided countless Canadian missions, mainly from Toronto, but also from such communities as Montreal, Ottawa and Vancouver.

Guides have a crucial role in a mission's success. "Visitors see Israel through our eyes and our mouths," Ezra says. "My goal is to show them the good the country has to offer. It's a positive message, one of hope. And it won't change now."

He has a network of friends and acquaintances in Canada with whom he maintains regular contact. "I know more people in Canada than in Petach Tikvah, where I live," he says.

Sitting in the Inbal lobby, eerily quiet at this usually busy breakfast hour, his face is unshaven in mourning during the shloshim. He is overcome with emotion. Tears well up in his eyes as he speaks about his son.

He projects a profound, unbounded adoration for Moshe that goes beyond love.

Moshe Eini

Above all, Ezra says, Moshe was connected to nature and the land, the breadth and width of which he walked with his friends. He was active in hiking clubs and the Scouts youth movement. He developed special skills in rock-climbing and rappelling, and he played basketball and skied.

In the IDF, Moshe started out in the prestigious Air Force pilots' course, but withdrew. "It didn't feel right for him," Ezra relates. "He wanted to smell the flower in the ground, not see it from above."

Moshe transferred to the combat engineering brigade. It was a platoon of this brigade that he commanded at the Ein Ariq roadblock. His unit had just relieved another unit that had been stationed there. His soldiers took over at 5 p.m. In the dark, at 9 p.m., the Palestinians attacked.

A piece of paper was later found in his trousers, on which he had noted what needed improvement at the installation. This, says his father, was typical of him: "Ninety-eight per cent wasn't acceptable, it had to be 100 per cent performance."

Moshe, Ezra says, knew how to separate his army life from his civilian activities. When he was home on his brief weekends off, he was always seeing friends, having fun "with a smile permanently on his face." But when he put on his uniform early Sunday morning, he was transformed back into a serious officer with a task to carry out, his father says.

But Moshe did not see the army as a career, Ezra says. He was considering studying nuclear physics.

Nearly 5,000 people attended Moshe's funeral. During the shivah, the house was overflowing with callers, from the army's top brass to Moshe's comrades. His own superior officer, recalls Ezra, said that he regarded Moshe as a model for how to be an officer.

Moshe was actually in transition when the attack took place. He was scheduled to be an instructor at the combat engineers' training program for recent graduates of the IDF officers course. "Only the best are selected for this job," a senior commander said. But it was not to be.

His father faces the tragedy and says, "If this is the contribution I have had to make, the dearest of all possible, I just hope that it won't be in vain."

Ezra points no finger; he has no accusations or complaints. He and his family struggle to go on. In a short while, he will start the day as a professional guide with his American tourists, whose journey to Israel at this time he regards as especially meaningful.

"I'm trying to separate between things," he says. "I think I'm managing. But I can't say it's easy."

Reuven Rosenfelder lives in Jerusalem and is with Keren Hayesod, United Israel Appeal.

Smiles in Jerusalem

By BATSHEVA POMERANTZ
IPS

The modern Dental Volunteers for Israel (DVI) clinic is located in Jerusalem, between the embattled neighbourhood of Gilo and the city centre – the site of repeated Palestinian terrorist attacks during the past year. Yet the clinic, which provides free dental care for needy Jewish and Arab children, is an island of tranquillity.

"Fortunately, parents have not cancelled appointments because they fear travelling by bus, and they are quite happy to come with their children from all parts of the city," says Trudi Birger, founder and director of DVI.

Dental Volunteers for Israel founder and director, Trudi Birger, in her office at the clinic.

Birger knows the meaning of suffering. A Holocaust survivor whose childhood in Frankfurt, Germany, came to an abrupt end in 1933 when the family began the first in a series of moves to evade Hitler's army, she vowed to dedicate her life to alleviating the suffering of children if she survived those terrible years.

Since DVI began in 1980, about 4,500 dentists from 13 countries have come at their own expense for a minimum two-week period, to volunteer their time and skill to help Jerusalem children of all backgrounds.

Many DVI dentists know about Birger's remarkable survival of the Holocaust and some have read her memoir, A Daughter's Gift of Love, which was published in October 2000 and has since been translated into many languages, including Japanese and Croatian.

With the deteriorating security situation in Israel since September 2000, many dentists have stopped coming to Israel. But Birger has been determined that the "children will not be neglected because of the situation. It is important that the program continue even in these tough times," she says.

As soon as the first cancellations arrived, Birger sent impassioned letters to some 350 Jerusalem dentists, asking them to volunteer. Very few responded. She then personally called all those on her list of overseas dentists, mostly non-Jews, to convince them of the importance of DVI's work. Some, like Arne H. of Oslo, Norway, responded eagerly, as did Dr. Anna Lindsors of Uppsala, Sweden, who even brought along her mother, an enthusiastic first-time visitor to Israel.

"When you watch the news in Sweden, it appears that the whole country is at war," observes Lindsors. "But this is simply not the case. Concerned friends have phoned us from Sweden, but I'm not really scared. I am from peaceful Sweden, but here it seems pretty peaceful too."

The Lindsors even went touring in Jerusalem, accompanied by others involved with DVI, and dined with Israeli families of different religious and political backgrounds. "This was the best part of the visit. I was impressed by the Israelis' hospitality," Anna Lindsors says.

Another Swedish dentist, Dr. Sven Busch of Norberg, has visited Israel 10 times since 1990, four of them as a DVI dentist.

"I'm experienced both with Israel and with the local, one-sided media," he says. "Because of the media situation, I felt the need to help Trudi and to pay my respects to Israel. My own personal safety did not enter into it."

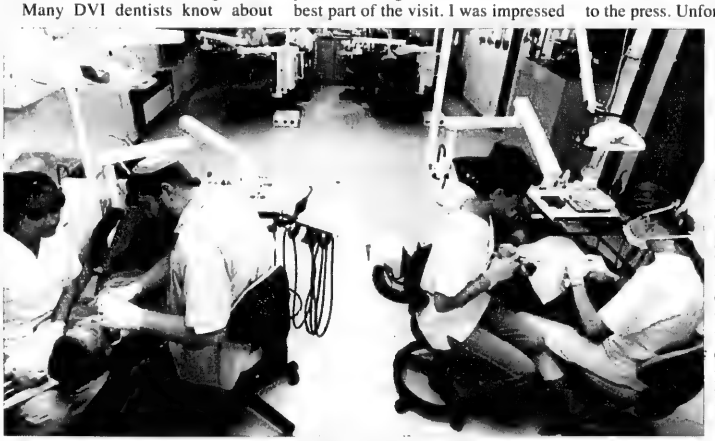
In Sweden, Busch has tried to persuade other dentists to visit. "I wrote letters, telling them that instead of staying home and reading the newspapers or watching television about the situation in Israel, they should go there and work."

For U.S. dentist Dr. Michael Elliott of North Carolina, this was his first trip to Israel. "Everybody is very friendly in Israel, compared to other countries where I have been on voluntary programs," he says "This year, I wanted to come here realizing that the need is greater. Everyone told me I was crazy but the reality is far better than the news indicates. The children at the clinic are well behaved. They come with their mothers and siblings. The assistant helps me understand them, but I usually understand them anyhow. I would come back again for this project."

In addition to helping the children, the dentists act as goodwill ambassadors for Israel. "When I return home, I will complain when I sense that something wrong is being reported on the news about the situation in Israel. I will tell our story to everyone I meet," Lindsors says.

Elliott expressed a similar intention. "I will convey to the people back home that they shouldn't be afraid to come to Israel," he says.

"We are a strong group in Sweden," Busch adds. "We write many articles about the true situation and send them to the press. Unfortunately, none have been published to date. We also circulate e-mails and have sent letters to the Swedish archbishop, who is pro-Palestinian."



Four volunteer dentists work simultaneously in Jerusalem's Dental Volunteers for Israel clinic in order to treat as many needy Jewish and Arab children as possible. [IPS photos]

Busch's suggestions to potential volunteers for DVI: "Trust in Trudi, who gives good advice as to where to go and what to avoid. Avoid crowded buses, travel by car and visit places with a certain amount of precaution. I'm never afraid in Israel!"

Despite the difficulties and the fact that the clinic is only running at an 80 per cent capacity, Birger's extraordinary dedication to the clinic and the devoted DVI dentists who give freely of their time and expertise are helping give the poor children of Jerusalem something to smile about in these troubled times.

When medicine could bridge the Middle Eastern divide

By MICHAEL GORDON

The Bedouin woman was flailing about screaming, her heavy embroidered dress flowing over the stretcher. Her face was pale and her pulse was 120 beats a minute with a blood pressure of 100/50. Her husband was explaining in Arabic to the translating nurse that she had developed terrible abdominal pain that afternoon. The nurse confirmed with the patient that she had missed her last period.

It had taken them over an hour to get to Haifa from their village. With them came five other members of the family, and others were gathering outside the department and in the garden outside the obstetrical unit at Haifa's Rambam Hospital. The husband told the woman to co-operate and "enshallah" (with the help of God), all would be well. Blood was taken for hematology and cross matching. The challenge was to get an intravenous going that would withstand her flailing movements.

I was an intern in the department of obstetrics and gynecology, having arrived a few days earlier after a two-month car journey from Scotland, where I had just finished my first intern rotation in medicine at Aberdeen's City Hospital. I was returning to Haifa because of a prize in obstetrics and gynecology that I received from my alma mater, the University of St. Andrews. I was returning to Rambam, having completed a summer studentship there two years previously.

The chief of the department asked if I had ever used an intracath. They had just received some, but no one in the department had any experience with them. I had learned how to use them during my Aberdeen internship and had become reasonably adept at this new procedure which replaced straight needles, taped to the arm, which were always "cutting out." It was the intern's nightmare to get the 3 a.m. call from the ward sister to report the IV had "gone para" and had to be replaced before the blood was ruined or the arm too swollen to use again for awhile.

I swabbed the arm, which was being held by two nurses, and while being watched buy the chief and a resident, I pulled from the package the six-inch catheter with a large bore needle at the end. The intravenous fluid and strips of tape were ready as I put the tourniquet on. The woman was volume depleted, which made it hard to find a vein, but eventually an ante-cubital vein just bigger than the needle could be felt.

With a combination of trepidation and confidence, I pushed the needle in with one movement. As blood rushed into the white catheter, I started to thread it into the vein as I released the tourniquet and pulled the needle out. When the IV was attached, the fluid poured in. While preparing the patient for the OR, we provided plasma. While the incision was being made, the first unit of blood was hung.

By the time the life-saving surgery was over, it seemed like half the village was camped outside the department, spread out on blankets – women in colourful dresses, with heads covered, and men wearing the traditional black and white scarf. When the husband was told that all was well, we could hear the shouts of jubilation outside.

The patient, the most dramatic of the Bedouin and Israeli-Arab patients I looked after in Haifa, was saddened by the loss of the pregnancy, but was joyful at the saving of her life. She was discharged two days later. The intracath was pulled out just prior to her discharge, my first contribution to a department that became my home for the next five months.

Some years later when I immigrated to Israel, I had another exciting experience caring for members of the Arab-Israeli community. I was now a medical resident in Jerusalem's Shaare Zedek Hospital, which had one of the busiest emergency departments in the city. One evening, an elderly Arab from a rural community was brought in. He had a wound on a lower foot and was going in and out of tetanic seizures. I had never seen a case of tetanus, but recalled the symptoms and signs from medical texts and was told by my staff physician that this was a case of status tetanus. An intern, the emergency room nurse and I managed to get an intravenous line in and administered the first dose of Valium, a drug I had only used intravenously for epileptic seizures. It took a number of repeated doses before the arched back and stiffened neck began to relax. Fortunately his breathing did not stop.

The many family members gathered outside the emergency room were told that the man was very ill, that his prognosis was poor and that we would move him into our newly created and very basic intensive care unit. Once he was settled, I ran to the library and discovered that treatment for him included debridement (surgical removal of dead tissue) and antibiotic treatment of the wound, and intravenous Valium at doses necessary to prevent the seizures.

After a few days, most of the villagers returned home, as the patient was maintained in a state of persistent semi-coma, under the influence of a steady infusion of Valium, titrated to keep him from seizing. He was difficult to nurse, as movement often resulted in muscular contractions, but everything possible was done to prevent pressure ulcers from developing.

Perhaps, one day, physicians will help bring peace

Gradually the dose of Valium required to prevent his seizures decreased and he began to awaken. Then, one day, we decided to stop the Valium and he did not seize. We sat him up in a chair and a staff member explained to him what had happened. He smiled at us and blessed us profusely. Two days later, two members of the village returned to visit and seemed astonished that he was sitting in a chair, thin and frail looking, but alive. A week later, he was discharged home, with many blessings from his family and profuse thanks and God's praise from him.

Still, the most exciting experience I had treating a member of the Arab community came when I was an Israeli Air Force physician, doing my rotations as a helicopter evacuation medical officer (equivalent to a MASH unit). I was stationed in Bir Gafkifa (an air base that belonged to the Egyptians prior to the Six Day War. I was now at a forward air force interceptor base and also served the Sinai Peninsula for helicopter evacuations, usually of injured or ill Israeli military personnel.

The call came in that there was an evacuation from the region of Santa Caterina, a monastery deep within the Sinai Peninsula. I had heard of tourists who waxed eloquent about the monastery's mysterious beauty, but I had never seen it.

As the helicopter took off, we all assumed that the evacuee was probably a tourist from one of the organized tours to the historical site. It was late afternoon when we started – an orderly and two paratroopers and I – a standard complement for medivac flights. The sun was setting as the monastery high on the mountain came into view. We could see the flare at the foot of the edifice, which we had been told to look for as a guide to where to pick up the patient.

When we landed, we realized that our assumptions were wrong. Lying on the makeshift stretcher was a 10-year-old boy covered from head to toe in a measles rash, delirious and severely dehydrated. The area nurse introduced the boy's father and told us that he would come with his son to the hospital.

I put in the intravenous line before loading the patient into the helicopter, because the helicopter movement was usually too great to perform procedures.

As we lifted off, the sun was setting over the monastery and the desert was suffused with pink and violet and purples, as the sun slid below the horizon. The father's eyes stared with disbelief as we headed south towards the hospital at Eilat. By the time we arrived, the night lights twinkling as we approached the landing pad, the boy had had sufficient fluid that he was beginning to open his eyes and ask his father where we were. The orderlies removed the boy and his father from the aircraft and we lifted off back through the desert night to the base. I will never forget the look of wonderment on that father's face, as if angels had descended to rescue his dying son – who, we found out the next day, had indeed been rescued.

Over the years that I lived in Israel, I provided care, with my Israeli colleagues, to many members of the Arab communities of Israel, Sinai and the West Bank. I always felt that medicine could help pave the way to peace, that it was my duty as a physician to provide care to everyone and that perhaps such care would act in a small way to cement the bonds that would make for peace. It seems that so far this goal has not been achieved, but that does not mean such actions by Israeli physicians will cease, and perhaps one day, peace will come and physicians will have been a small but important part of that process.

History lives at Jerusalem Archeological Park

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Below the southwestern corner of Jerusalem's Temple Mount, near the archeological feature known as Robinson's Arch, lies a random assortment of massive stone building blocks.

Though you might not realize it at first, these blocks help bring history to life. They were once part of a parapet wall along the perimeter of the Temple Mount. One day in 70 CE, Roman soldiers intent on destroying every vestige of the Jewish Temple pushed the huge stones over the edge.

For nearly two millennia, they have lain where they have fallen.

Stones from the parapet wall of Temple Mount lie where they had fallen nearly 2,0000 years ago. [Bill Gladstone photo]

One of the stones carried part of an ancient Hebrew inscription – "To the area of the trumpets" – which evidently was meant to give directions to Temple shofar-blowers.

Since this is the only inscription discovered from the Second Temple, it was removed to the protection of the Israel Museum and replaced on-site with a replica.

The stones seem to have fallen into an ancient street, whose authentic paving stones are still roughly in place. Due to the deterioration of the underlying drainage system, however, some of the pavement stones have collapsed.

These historic remnants of the Second Temple period were only uncovered in the recent past, after the Six Day War. The period since 1967, which has seen the reunification of Jerusalem, has been one of extraordinary archeological discovery and achievement in Israel.

Robinson's Arch, that bit of Herodian masonry that protrudes from the Western Wall, is presently about 18 metres above ground level. It was at ground level in 1968, and considerably below that in 1835 when the American Bible scholar Edward Robinson (1794-1863) recognized it as the beginning of an arch. Israeli archeologists have carefully examined and removed centuries of rubble.

Historians have determined that Robinson's Arch was part of a causeway over the Tyropoeon Valley to the Upper City, meant to save Temple worshipers an arduous descent and climb to get to the Jewish Quarter. They have also determined that the nearby series of supports for the causeway-bridge once housed four Herodian-era shops.

All these elements and many others are incorporated in the Jerusalem Archeological Park, also known as the Ophel Archeological Park, which, after years of development, fully opened in 2001 with minimum fanfare.

Around the corner, on the south side of the Temple Mount, is the set of stairs that led up to the southern entrance to the Temple. Portions of a double and triple gate are visible, partly blocked off by layers of architecture from later periods. There are also remains of several Ummayad-period palaces, mikvahs, a medieval tower, a Byzantine building and other structures. (It's best to visit the park with a knowledgeable guide who can illuminate this complicated history.)

Also on the site is the Davidson Center, which occupies a restored Umayyad palace. The center offers intriguing exhibitions and illustrations that reflect the Second Temple era, the Roman and Byzantine eras, and the early Muslim period.

You can also learn about archeology and Jewish history here. A short documentary film presents the story of 150 years of excavations in the precincts of the Archeological Park, beginning with the excavations of the Palestine Exploration Fund in the 1850s. A 10-minute digital video describes Jewish pilgrimage to Jerusalem during the Second Temple period.

For many, the pièce de résistance of the Davidson Center, and perhaps the whole Archeological Park, may be the Virtual Reconstruction Model of the Herodian Temple Mount. Visitors are shown a convincingly realistic portrayal of the Second Temple, projected onto a screen by a powerful supercomputer and a high-resolution projection system.

Admission to the Jerusalem Archaeological Park is 12 NIS (under $4) for adults. To get a better idea of what the Park is all about, visit its impressive Web site at [www.archpark.org.il/].

Joint vision: photojournalism seminar exposes, explores Jewish-Arab relations

By WENDY ELLIMAN
IPS

Israeli photographer Avi Amran of Beit Shemesh felt awkward sitting in a class with Arab students at the first Jewish-Arab seminar in journalism and photojournalism, especially once the violence of the new intifadah erupted.

"My discomfort lasted the first several weeks of the seminar, but I travelled a long road during that year," he says of the course that he was enrolled in at the 16-year-old Jerusalem School of Photography and New Media in the city's Musrara neighbourhood. The seminar opened just a few weeks before the current violence began.

"Eventually, I chose to do my course-project with an Arab fellow-student, Ahmad Abdul Rahman, a photographer from Abu Ghosh," Amran says. "With him, as with several other Arab students in the seminar, our professional collaboration eventually became friendship, and we still visit one another at home with our families."

For Palestinian photographer Steve Sabella of Jerusalem's Old City, the seminar "opened new avenues for me, and not just professionally. I'd been trying to use my work to force people to open their minds, and show them aspects of Arab life they wouldn't expect. During the course, I met both Israeli students and guest lecturers whose minds were already open. Many of them see our plight, and this has restored my faith for the future."

'An attempt to see the world from perspective of Arab woman'

The seminar, which was taught one day a week for a year, is among several community and co-operation projects fostered by the school (in addition to its full-time programs it teaches in photography, computer imaging and multimedia), all of them supported in part by the Jerusalem Foundation.

The course aimed to give Jewish and Arab photographers and journalists the opportunity to enhance their skills as they explored matters of concern in Israeli society. Heavily oversubscribed, the first course accepted 70 students. A second course with another 70 is now in progress. A third may focus on bridging gaps between Israel's religious and non-religious communities, rather than between Arab and Jew.

Chava Biran, the school's co-ordinator of special projects, says that "while the seminar's purpose was high-level professional training in photojournalism and documentary writing, its underlying theme was, of course, co-existence.

"The external situation made that theme far harder to handle, on both the practical and the emotional levels, but in the end, the students' achievement was correspondingly greater."

Photography school director Avi Sabag says that "by using photography and journalism to expose and explore Jewish-Arab relations, and examine the peace process and social and cultural conflicts, students were later able to move on to develop a common discourse.

"They communicated through their profession, and shared thoughts and aspects of their lives that increase understanding and facilitate dialogue."

Israeli photographer Marsha Vainstein used her camera to explore the feelings of the "other." Winding a white scarf around her head Arab-style, she photographed herself in Jerusalem's Old City.

"It was an attempt to see the world from the perspective of an Arab woman," she says. "I called it Portrait of the Artist as Someone Else."

Amram created a photo-montage of four images of a man in flames on the steps of the Dome of the Rock.

"It's called Abraham-Isaac-Ishmael," he says, "and it represents my spiritual progress during the year of the seminar. It shows Abraham as the common father of Jew and Arab, of the fire that rages between his sons, Isaac and Ishmael, and how that fire must be extinguished and room made for both."

Daphna Kaplan, from Tel Aviv, photographed graffiti all over Israel and displays some 80 examples in Hebrew, Arabic and English. Fellow students Raed Bwayeh and Ilya Melnikov pointed their cameras at normal, everyday events, such as family picnics by the beach and Old City street scenes.

Sabella's pictures, however, best capture the seminar's theme of hope and change. In his effort to show unexpected aspects of Palestinian life, he has photographed beauty in areas better known for their human ugliness. His lyrical views and sunsets of Nablus and Gaza symbolize a more hopeful future.

'I love this country'

By SHIRA HONIG
CJN Staff

Looking down from the plane at the Mediterranean's cobalt blue sheen, it seems like all I have to do to unlock the sea's secret underwater treasures is reach out and peel back its surface. The excitement in the El Al plane mounts as we circle above Ben-Gurion airport. A huge cheer erupts when we touch Israeli soil, and we begin to sing. I've been to Israel three times before, but never have I cheered so loudly.

The last time I was here was in July 2000 for my sister's wedding, before the second intifadah broke out, before the United Nations' anti-racism conference in Durban, South Africa, before Sept. 11, before anti-Semitic violence spread across the globe like wildfire. Before everything. I hope that when it comes to Israel, I will never grow tired or jaded, no matter how many times I visit.

We're here on a mission. If you read this paper regularly, or if you read The Jerusalem Post, you've heard about it. Sixty-five Canadians, aged 18 to 32, many of whom have participated in Birthright Israel, are here for a week to volunteer, either with the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) or with Yad Eliezer, a non-profit organization that packages and delivers food to the country's poor.

Like me, many others on this trip have been to Israel several times before, and many have family here. We're all ready to contribute, even in a small way, to this great country's well-being.

Immediately after disembarking the plane – some of us kissing the ground – we get on our tour buses to be driven directly to Jerusalem's City Hall. In true Israeli style, we are given banana shakes and chocolate wafers.

From here on in, everything is in brilliant colour. The slight green hills, the square and blue plots of land, and the neat white structures of scattered kibbutzim and moshavim are soaked in the golden light of the late afternoon sun. Even the rocks and the abandoned tanks from the 1948 War of Independence that lie along the road to Jerusalem cast a glow. Black and white film is pointless here.

At City Hall, Ehud Olmert, Jerusalem's mayor, greets us in a conference room upstairs. He thanks us for coming and there are photo ops with the press. The next day – our first day of work at the Yad Eliezer warehouse in Jerusalem – begins chaotically, with an Israeli worker named Yoseph yelling at us to hurry, and us responding by throwing boxes and foodstuffs around without any organization whatsoever. After some confusion and laughter, we settle into a steady assembly-line rhythm, putting together boxes and filling them with items such as flour and sugar.

It's easy, during bleary-eyed moments in a week with little sleep, to forget why I'm here. But every Israeli I meet reminds me – not through their endless thanks, but with their eyes. Some nod at us nonchalantly, but many are clearly delighted and touched that we have come. Nowhere is this more evident than at the Erev Yom Yerushalayim parade that winds through Jerusalem's main streets from City Hall to Sacher Gardens.

The downtown area is transformed for the event. Balloons, floats and Israeli flags are everywhere. Members of the Gush Katif community hand out fresh red peppers. Kikar Tzion is adorned with rainbow-coloured flags. Temporary stages are filled with dancers and musicians. Signs, posters and t-shirts read: Kulanu olim l'yerushalayim (we're all going to Jerusalem), kol hakavod l'tzahal (kudos to the IDF) and halev omer todah (the heart says thank you). Throngs of students dance in spontaneous horahs and smile for cameras.

As we join the procession, waving our Canadian flags and singing and cheering, I can see the emotion in the eyes of the people who have lined the streets behind the police barricades. Though not many have turned out for the event, they're there. One of our group's participants lets a small boy wave his huge Canadian flag; a soldier bends down and gives a little girl a red flower. The men, women and children watching the parade can see the transformation of the city better than any of us can. I feel incredibly privileged to be here at this moment. I want to reach out and thank them all for being so strong and inspiring. Jaffa Street may have been a war-zone on all too many occasions, but the strength and vibrancy of these Israelis cannot be extinguished.

Every native I speak to is confident that they – we – will survive the current conflict

Depending on the way you look at it, the cup is half-full or half-empty. Over the next seven days, I witness much Israeli joy and spirit. I see stores that are closed, but quite a few that are open. Every native I speak to is confident that they – we – will survive the current conflict. The only explosions I hear on Yom Yerushalayim are the sounds of firecrackers over the park, and the air of the Old City is filled with the smells of laundry, challah, olives and pizza.

During the course of the week, I walk in downtown Jerusalem without feeling concerned for my safety. But I also see quiet streets at night and some deserted public places. Hardly any tourists are at the Israel Museum when I visit; for a time, I'm the only person in the Shrine of the Book.

So if you're so inclined, I recommend that you help fill those streets at your earliest opportunity. If you're not so inclined, I suggest you do it anyway. There may never be an ideal time to go. But the state exists now – after more than 2,000 years of it being an impossibility – and now is the ideal time to play a part in its history and welfare, and to feel a part of something much bigger than yourself. If you embrace it, it will captivate you.

Throughout the week, there are moments of boisterous singing, cheering and dancing. We make Havdalah in a joy-filled ceremony on a hotel rooftop at Kibbutz Maale Hachamisha and sing Hatikvah. Someone yells out, "I love this country!"

We all do. Halev omēr todah. Am Yisrael Chai.

Guidebook offers scholarly detail in friendly, readable style

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

For avid travellers, the publication of a new guidebook for a beloved country is often the occasion for considerable curiosity and hope.

On a recent trip to Israel, I tried out a relatively new guidebook – the 2nd edition of the Footprint Israel Handbook – and was delighted to discover that it offers more scholarly detail than I have yet seen in an Israel guidebook, while retaining a friendly, readable style.

The book was written by Dave Winter and published just before the latest intifadah got under way. It's worth reading, even if only in remembrance of trips taken. It also makes an excellent tool for planning a future trip.

The book is brimming with respect for the Jewish people and their land, and what makes both of them special. It reflects an unmistakable fascination for its subject and a thorough familiarity with history and culture. There are many thoughtful sidebars, 16 pages of colour photographs and hundreds of small sketch maps and illustrations.

Pick a spot: Chances are you'll find more relevant information about it in Footprint than in any other Israel guide you can name. The text is not just a dry catalogue of facts and figures; it's informed by fine judgment, as you can see in this straightforward assessment at the beginning of the chapter on the Mediterranean Coastal Strip:

"Visitors seeking a sun, sea and sand holiday tend to head to Eilat, at the southern tip of the Negev. This is a great pity since the beaches along the Mediterranean coast, despite lacking the underwater splendour of the Red Sea's coral reefs, are infinitely superior."

As expected, there are extensive chapters on Jerusalem and all regions from the Negev to the Galilee and the Golan. Naturally, Footprint treads carefully when presenting its chapters on the West Bank and Gaza; I was impressed by its sensitive treatment of political issues over nomenclature and other matters.

Although it presents many suggestions about where to stay and eat, and discusses the relative merits of bus travel and car rental, the book seems less concerned with these pragmatic matters than the Frommer, Fodor or Lonely Planet guides. The main focus seems to be on the sights that brought us to the region in the first place.

My two favourite guidebooks on Israel until now have been Lonely Planet Israel and the Knopf Guide to the Holy Land. The Footprint Israel Handbook seems to offer as much useful information as both of them put together. It takes an honoured place beside these trusted favourites on my shelf.

Those who venture to Israel, or are planning to do so reasonably soon, should consider taking this worthy guidebook along.

Dr. Chaim Weizmann and The Arabs

By AVNER MEIRI

The relationship between Dr. Chaim Weizmann, the first president of the State of Israel, and the Arabs has a long and interesting history.

When Weizmann arrived in Egypt in March 1918 with the members of the Zionist Commission, he discovered that Lord Arthur Balfour's remarks that "the Arab problem is not a serious obstacle" did not really stand up to the reality of the situation.

None of the Zionist leaders were aware of, or familiar with, developments in the Arab national movement. Many Arab leaders joined the revolt of Sherif Hussain from Hejaz – what is today western Saudi Arabia – against the Turks in the hopes that they would have an independent Arab state from the ruins of the Ottoman Empire.

In time, Weizmann noted the special problems confronting him in his efforts to improve Jewish-Arab relations. Though the Arab leaders of Egypt and Hejaz were ready to co-operate with the Zionists in return for their support in establishing an Arab federation, the Arabs of Palestine were suspicious and felt they were being asked to give up something without receiving anything in return.

Weizmann seized the first opportunity to eliminate these suspicions when he was invited to a reception given on April 27, 1918, by the governor of Jerusalem, Sir Ronald Storrs. Many distinguished Palestinian Arab leaders attended the gathering, including Mussa Kazim Al-Hussaini, the mayor of Jerusalem, and his deputy, S. Salamah, as well as representatives from the Greek Orthodox and Armenian churches in Jerusalem.

Dr. Chaim Weizmann

In his speech, Weizmann declared: "I am not foreign to this country, even though I was born a little to the north. None of my brothers, who are scattered over the whole world, are foreign to this country. We are not coming to Palestine now, but are returning to our borders. There is enough land and enough room in Palestine to settle several times the number of people it now holds. All the fears expressed by the Arabs, openly or in secret, lest they be ousted from the land on which they now live, are nothing but the fruit of a gross error about our approach and our aspirations, or the result of phantoms created by our common enemies. It is better for us to live in peace, and only if this is the case will the country develop in a proper manner. Once again, we are witnessing the formation of a strong and united Arab body, which is taking on a new life and is about to resuscitate the glorious tradition of Arab science and literature, which are so close to our hearts."

When Storrs referred to the Balfour Declaration in his welcoming remarks, there were cries of opposition from the assembled Arab leaders. The Mufti of Jerusalem, Kamal Al-Hussaini, the older brother of Haj Amin Al-Hussaini, who succeeded him, left the reception in protest.

Weizmann's unsuccessful attempts to talk to other influential Arab leaders of Palestine, including Kamal Al-Hussaini, showed how deeply suspicious they were of Jewish intentions.

On Balfour's advice, Weizmann approached Emir Faisal ibn Hussain, a member of the Hashemite dynasty of Arabia, who became king of Iraq in 1921. The meeting was arranged and held at Faisal's headquarters near Aqaba in June 1918. The two leaders discussed future relations between the Jews and the Arabs in the Middle East.

This meeting, as well as future talks between the two men and other Zionist leaders in Europe, led to the Weizmann-Faisal Agreement of Jan. 3, 1919. The agreement outlined the close relationship between the two ancient peoples. It promised that all necessary measures would be taken to encourage and stimulate Jewish immigration to Palestine "on a large scale." In addition, it also guaranteed that Muslim holy places would be under Muslim supervision.

When Arab-Jewish tensions increased in the 1920s with Arab riots in Jerusalem, Faisal refrained from any reference to the agreement. His excuse for the violence was that Arab demands were not met, and that the agreement was conditional on their fulfilment.

But Weizmann never gave up hope. He continued in his efforts to obtain a settlement between the Jews and the Arabs – in particular, the Arabs of Palestine. Faisal, on the other hand, drew a middle course between confidence and fear and between friendship and opposition.

Several American Zionist leaders, including U.S. Supreme Court Justice Felix Frankfurter, called on Faisal to clarify his position. After their meeting in Paris in early 1919, Faisal sent the following letter to Frankfurter:

British interference cancels Weizmann-Pasha meeting

"I want to take this opportunity of my first contact with American Zionists to tell you what I have often been able to say to Dr. Weizmann in Arabia and in Europe. We feel that the Arabs and Jews are cousins in race, having suffered similar oppressions at the hands of powers stronger than themselves, and by a happy coincidence, having been able to take the first step towards the attainment of their national ideas together."

He further noted: "We Arabs, especially the educated among us, look with the deepest sympathy on the Zionist movement. With the chiefs of your movement, especially with Dr. Weizmann, we have had and continue to have the closest relations. He has been a great helper to our cause, and I hope the Arabs may soon be in a position to give the Jews some return for their kindness. We are working together for a reformed and revived Near East, and our two movements compliment one another."

After this date, Weizmann made many attempts to meet Faisal and other Arab leaders in order to continue their dialogue, but sadly, most of these attempts were sabotaged by the British authority in the Middle East.

One of these instances occured in 1924, when Weizmann arrived in Cairo, anxious to meet with Egyptian leaders to obtain a declaration in support of the Zionist movement. With the help of an Egyptian Jewish friend, Leon Castro, Weizmann succeeded in arranging a meeting with Saad Zaglul Pasha, a prominent Egyptian leader and head of the Wafd party.

On the same day as the planned meeting with Pasha, Weizmann had been invited for lunch at the residence of the British High Commissioner. During the course of the afternoon, Weizmann mentioned that he had an appointment with Pasha later in the day in order to obtain a declaration in support of Zionism.

The British saw Pasha as an enemy because of his struggles to free his people and his country from the oppression of colonialism. The high commissioner advised Weizmann to cancel the appointment. The meeting never took place.

Avner Meiri was born in Baghdad. A retired teacher now living in Toronto, he devotes most of his time to Hebrew and English literature.

Statement in the United Nations General Assembly by Ambassador Chaim Herzog on the item "Elimination of all forms of racial discrimination," Nov. 10, 1975.

In view of events unfolding today, we have decided to reproduce excerpts from the remarks made by Israel's ambassador to the United Nations, Chaim Herzog, on Nov. 10, 1975, immediately after the adoption of Resolution 3379 on eliminating racial discrimination. He rose to denounce the resolution and those who voted for its adoption, spoke about the origin and meaning of Zionism and said Israel was not bound by this resolution and would not abide by it.

It is symbolic that this debate, which may well prove to be a turning point in the fortunes of the United Nations and a decisive factor as to the possible continued existence of this organization, should take place on 10 November. This night, 37 years ago, has gone down in history as Kristallnacht, or the Night of the Crystals...

It is indeed fitting that this draft, conceived in the desire to deflect the Middle East from its moves towards peace, and born of a deep, pervading feeling of anti-Semitism, should come up for debate on this day which recalls one of the tragic days in one of the darkest periods of history. It is indeed fitting that the United Nations, which began its life as an anti-Nazi alliance, should, 30 years later, find itself on its way to becoming the world centre of anti-Semitism. Hitler would have felt at home on a number of occasions during the past year, listening to the proceedings in this forum and, above all, to the proceedings during the debate on Zionism.

It is a sobering reflection indeed to consider to what this body has been dragged down, if we are obliged today to contemplate an attack on Zionism. For this attack constitutes not only an anti-Semitic attack of the foulest type, but also an attack in this world body on Judaism, one of the oldest established religions in the world, a religion which has given the world the human values of the Bible, a religion from which two other great religions, Christianity and Islam, sprang, a great and established religion that has given to the world the Bible with its Ten Commandments; the great prophets of old, Moses, Isaiah, Amos; the great thinkers of history, Maimonides, Spinoza, Marx, Einstein; many of the masters of the arts; and as high a percentage of Nobel Prize winners in the world, in the sciences, the arts and the humanities, as has been achieved by any other people on earth.

One can but ponder and wonder at the prospect of countries, which consider themselves to be part of the civilized world, joining in this first organized attack on an established religion since the Middle Ages. Yes, to these depths are we being dragged by those who propose this draft resolution – to the Middle Ages.

The draft resolution before the Third Committee was originally a resolution condemning racism and colonialism, a subject on which consensus could have been achieved, a consensus which is of great importance to all of us and to our African colleagues in particular. However, instead of this being permitted to happen, a group of countries, drunk with the feeling of power inherent in the automatic majority, and without regard to the importance of achieving a consensus on this issue, railroaded the committee in a contemptuous manner by the use of the automatic majority, into bracketing Zionism with the subject under discussion. Indeed, it is difficult to speak of this base move with any measure of restraint.

'Zion...the Jewish homeland'

I do not come to this rostrum to defend the moral and historical values of the Jewish people. They do not need to be defended. They speak for themselves. They have given to mankind much of what is great and eternal. They have done for the spirit of man more than can readily be appreciated in a forum such as this one.

I come here to denounce the two great evils which menace society in general and a society of nations in particular. These two evils are hatred and ignorance. These two evils are the motivating force behind the proponents of this draft resolution and their supporters. These two evils characterize those who would drag this world organization, the idea of which was first conceived by the prophets of Israel, to the depths to which it has been dragged today.

The key to understanding Zionism lies in its name. In the Bible, the westernmost of the two hills of ancient Jerusalem was called Zion. The period was the 10th century BC. In fact, the name "Zion" appears 152 times in the Old Testament referring to Jerusalem. The name is overwhelmingly a poetic and prophetic designation. The religious and emotional qualities of the name arise from the importance of Jerusalem as the Royal City and the City of the Temple. Mount Zion is the place where God dwells according to the Bible. Jerusalem, or Zion, is a place where the Lord is King according to Isaiah, and where he has installed his King David, as quoted in the Psalms.

KING DAVID MADE JERUSALEM THE CAPITAL OF ISRAEL ALMOST 3,000 YEARS AGO, AND JERUSALEM HAS REMAINED THE CAPITAL EVER SINCE.

King David made Jerusalem the capital of Israel almost 3,000 years ago, and Jerusalem has remained the capital ever since. During the centuries, the term "Zion" grew and expanded to mean the whole of Israel. The Israelites in exile could not forget Zion.

The Hebrew psalmist sat by the waters of Babylon and swore, "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning." This oath has been repeated for thousands of years by Jews throughout the world. It is an oath which was made over 700 years before the advent of Christianity, and over 1,200 years before the advent of Islam.

In view of all these connotations, Zion came to mean the Jewish homeland, symbolic of Judaism, of Jewish national aspirations.

Every Jew, while praying to his God, wherever he is in the world, faces towards Jerusalem. These prayers have expressed for over 2,000 years of exile the yearning of the Jewish people to return to their ancient homeland, Israel. In fact, a continuous Jewish presence, in larger or smaller numbers, has been maintained in the country over the centuries.

Zionism is the name of the national movement of the Jewish people and is the modern expression of the ancient Jewish heritage. The Zionist ideal, as set out in the Bible, has been, and is, an integral part of the Jewish religion.

Zionism is to the Jewish people what the liberation movement of Africa and Asia have been to their peoples. Zionism is one of the most stirring and constructive national movements in human history. Historically, it is based on a unique and unbroken connection, extending some 4,000 years, between the People of the Book and the Land of the Bible.

In modern times, in the late 19th century, spurred by the twin forces of anti-Semitic persecution and nationalism, the Jewish people organized the Zionist movement in order to transform their dream into reality. Zionism as a political movement was the revolt of an oppressed nation against the depredations and wicked discrimination and oppression of the countries in which anti-Semitism flourished. It is indeed no coincidence at all, and not surprising, that the sponsors and supporters of this draft resolution include countries which are guilty of the horrible crime of anti-Semitism and discrimination to this very day.

Support for the aim of Zionism was written into the League of Nations Mandate for Palestine, and was again endorsed by the United Nations in 1947, when the General Assembly voted by an overwhelming majority for the restoration of Jewish independence in our ancient land.

The re-establishment of Jewish independence in Israel, after centuries of struggle to overcome foreign conquest and exile, is a vindication of the fundamental concepts of the equality of nations and of self-determination. To question the Jewish people's right to national existence and freedom is not only to deny to the Jewish people the right accorded to every other people on this globe but it is also to deny the central precepts of the United Nations.

For Zionism is nothing more – and nothing less – than the Jewish people's sense of origin and destination in the land, linked eternally with its name. It is also the instrument whereby the Jewish nation seeks an authentic fulfilment of itself. And the drama is enacted in the region in which the Arab nation has realized its sovereignty in 20 states, comprising 100 million people in 4½ million square miles, with vast resources. The issue therefore is not whether the world will come to terms with Arab nationalism. The question is at what point Arab nationalism, with its prodigious glut of advantage, wealth and opportunity, will come to terms with the modest but equal rights of another Middle Eastern nation to pursue its life in security and peace.

The vicious diatribes on Zionism voiced here by Arab representatives, may give this Assembly the wrong impression, that while the rest of the world supported the Jewish national liberation movement, the Arab world was always hostile to Zionism.

That is not the case. Arab leaders, cognizant of the rights of the Jewish people, fully endorsed the virtues of Zionism. Sherif Hussain, the leader of the Arab world during the First World War, welcomed the return of the Jews to Palestine. His son, Emir Faisal, who represented the Arab world in the Paris Peace Conference had this to say about Zionism on March 3, 1919:

Tribute to Israel

'Testing agent of human decency'

"We Arabs, especially the educated among us, look with deepest sympathy on the Zionist movement... We will wish the Jews a hearty welcome home... We are working together for a reformed and revised Near East, and our two movements complement one another. The movement is national and not imperialistic. There is room in Syria for us both. Indeed, I think that neither can be a success without the other..."

We in Israel have endeavoured to create a society which strives to implement the highest ideals of society – political, social and cultural – for all the inhabitants of Israel, irrespective of religious belief, race or sex. Show me another pluralistic society in this world in which, despite all the difficult problems among which we live, Jew and Arab live together with such a degree of harmony, in which the dignity and rights of man are observed before the law, in which no death sentence is applied, in which freedom of speech, of movement, of thought, of expression are guaranteed, in which even movements which are opposed to our national aims are represented in our Parliament.

The Arab delegates talk of racism. It lies not in their mouths. What has happened to the 800,000 Jews who lived for over 2,000 years in the Arab lands, who formed some of the most ancient communities long before the advent of Islam? Where are those communities? What happened to the people, what happened to their property?

The Jews were once one of the important communities in the countries of the Middle East, the leaders of thought, of commerce, of medical science. Where are they in Arab society today?...

[Zionism] is our attempt to build a society, imperfect though it may be – and what society is perfect? – in which the visions of the prophets of Israel will be realized. I know that we have problems. I know that many disagree with our government's policies. Many in Israel, too, disagree from time to time with the government's policies, and are free to do so, because Zionism has created the first and only real democratic state in a part of the world that never really knew democracy and freedom of speech.

This malicious resolution, designed to divert us from its true purpose, is part of a dangerous anti-Semitic idiom which is being insinuated into every public debate by those who have sworn to block the current move towards accommodation and ultimately towards peace in the Middle East...

We are seeing here today but another manifestation of the bitter anti-Semitic, anti-Jewish hatred which animates Arab society. Who would have believed that in the year of 1975 the malicious falsehoods of the Elders of Zion would be distributed officially by Arab governments? Who would have believed that we would today contemplate an Arab society which teaches the vilest anti-Jewish hate in the kindergartens? Who would have believed that an Arab head of state would feel obliged to indulge publicly in anti-Semitism of the cheapest nature when visiting a friendly nation? We are being attacked by a society which is motivated by the most extreme form of racism known in the world today. This is the racism which was expressed so succinctly in the words of the leader of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO), Yasser Arafat, in his opening address at a symposium in Tripoli, Libya, and I quote: "There will be no presence in the region except for the Arab presence." In other words, in the Middle East, from the Atlantic Ocean to the Persian Gulf, only one presence is allowed, and that is the Arab presence. No other people, regardless of how deep are its roots in the region, is to be permitted to enjoy its right of self-determination.

Twin evils of the world: hatred and ignorance

Look at the tragic fate of the Kurds of Iraq. Look at what happened to the black population in southern Sudan. Look at the dire peril in which an entire community of Christians finds itself in Lebanon. Look at the avowed policy of the PLO, which calls, in its Palestine Covenant, for the destruction of the State of Israel, which denies any form of compromise on the Palestine issue, and which, in the words of its representative only the other day in this building, considers Tel Aviv to be occupied territory. Look at all this and you see before you the root cause of the pernicious resolution brought before this Assembly. You see the twin evils of this world at work: the blind hatred of the Arab proponents of this resolution, and the abysmal ignorance and wickedness of those who support them...

Over the centuries, it has fallen to the lot of my people to be the testing agent of human decency, the touchstone of civilization, the crucible in which enduring human values are to be tested. A nation's level of humanity could invariably be judged by its behaviour towards its Jewish population. It always began with the Jews but never ended with them...

This wicked resolution must sound the alarm for all decent people in the world. The Jewish people, as a testing agent, has unfortunately never erred. The implications inherent in this shameful move are terrifying indeed...

As I stand on this rostrum, the long and proud history of my people unravels itself before my inward eye, I see the oppressors of our people over the ages as they pass one after another in evil procession into oblivion. I stand here before you as the representative of a strong and flourishing people which has survived them all...

For us, the Jewish people, this is but a passing episode in a rich and an event-filled history. We put our trust in our Providence, in our faith and beliefs, in our time-hallowed tradition, in our striving for social advance and human values, and in our people wherever they may be. For us, the Jewish people, this resolution, based on hatred, falsehood and arrogance, is devoid of any moral or legal value. For us, the Jewish people, this is no more than a piece of paper, and we shall treat it as such.

At this point, Herzog tore the document, in full view of the plenary assembly, and left the dais.

Students, faculty reject call for Israel disinvestment

By JULIE WIENER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Israel supporters in Cambridge, Mass., have hit back hard in response to a small faculty campaign urging Harvard and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT) to divest from companies conducting business in Israel.

Responding to a pro-divestment faculty petition that garnered nearly 120 signatures, 4,000 Harvard and MIT faculty, students and staff have signed a counter-petition calling the divestment effort "a one-sided attempt to delegitimize Israel."

Among the more famous anti-divestment signatories are law professors Alan Dershowitz and Laurence Tribe, Near Eastern languages and civilizations professor Shaye Cohen and medical professor Dr. Jerome Groopman.

The debate at Harvard and MIT comes amid a flurry of divestment campaigns at universities across the United States, including Princeton, the University of Michigan and the University of California system.

Modelled on successful efforts in the 1980s to get universities to divest their holdings in apartheid South Africa, the new campaigns often make explicit comparisons between Israel and South Africa.

For example, the Web site promoting the Princeton divestment petition – which has the support of 41 faculty members – features a quote from Archbishop Desmond Tutu: "If I were to change the names, a description of what is happening in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank could describe events in South Africa."

A conference aimed at launching a national divestment effort was held in March in Berkeley, organized by a group called Students for Justice in Palestine.

The divestment activists have not yet persuaded any university to consider divesting from companies operating in Israel or from U.S. companies that sell arms to Israel.

However, Jewish groups say the campaign's real goal is to demonize Israel.

"It's a tool to implant in the minds of the campus and the larger society that Israel today is like the South Africa of yore, that Israel is the contemporary apartheid state," said Jeffrey Ross, director of campus-higher education affairs for the Anti-Defamation League.

The efforts are also an attempt to attract left-wing students and non- white students to the Palestinian cause, Ross said.

The divestment effort at Harvard and MIT suffered setbacks with a May 8 editorial in the Harvard Crimson calling comparisons to South Africa "offensive, repugnant and detrimental to peace."

"This proposal for divestment once again makes Israel the victim of a double standard," the editorial says. "Israel is not the only nation that takes strong and forceful action in times of war, yet it is consistently singled out for criticism."

Harvard's president, Lawrence Summers, told students at a public event that he opposes divestment from Israel, the Crimson reported.

The Harvard-MIT divestment effort sparked particular concern, Jewish activists say, because two of the faculty signatories were "house masters," or faculty who serve as counsellors and advisers at residential halls.

The divestment petition calls on the universities to divest until Israel – among other things – complies with UN Security Council Resolution 242 and accepts that Palestinian refugees either be allowed to return to their former lands or be compensated for their losses.

Israel accepts Resolution 242 and other resolutions on refugees, but not the Arab interpretation of those documents.

Harvard has an estimated $614 million in investments in companies that conduct business in Israel.

Beside the 54 MIT faculty and 64 Harvard ones, five Israeli academics signed the petition calling for divestment.

The anti-divestment petition, written by Harvard and MIT faculty and signed by faculty, staff, students and alumni, has been circulated in part by a new student group called Harvard Students for Justice in the Middle East.

The petition notes that the signatories have "diverse opinions on how peace in the Middle East can be achieved," but notes that "to place blame solely on Israel for the recent state of affairs and to demand unilateral concessions without showing any concern for its self-defense is unjust."

Jeffrey Bander, a medical student who in the past few weeks helped spearhead the new Harvard students' group, said the anti-divestment petition's success is "a good example for other Jews."

Bander, who has been to Israel several times but had not previously been involved in campus Jewish organizations, said the group was born out of frustration over "the propaganda and misinformation prevalent on campus."

"I feel that, in general, there's a war going on on our campuses, and that war is being won and fought very well by the pro-Palestinian side," Bander said.

"Very little is done by Jewish groups or agencies to help explain what Israel's position is."

Harvard's Hillel has also circulated the anti-divestment petition. In addition, it is sending a student-faculty solidarity mission to Israel next month, and is raising money to purchase new ambulances for Israel.

The campus also started a Jewish-Palestinian dialogue group this spring.

While Harvard has not been a hub of anti-Israel activity, it has been "uncomfortable to state really pro-Israel views in public" there, said Benjamin Solomon-Schwartz, Hillel's student president.

"In general, especially within the Jewish community, this is a difficult question because we want to say something powerful in support of Israel, but there is a large diversity of opinions," Solomon-Schwartz said. "We don't want to alienate people who don't have a certain opinion, but we want to be a voice for support of Israel on campus."

Princeton's divestment campaign sparked a smaller counter-effort, spearheaded in part by Adina Yoffie, daughter of the Reform movement's president, Rabbi Eric Yoffie.

CBC: responsibly questioning the 'massacre'

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

By mid April, while major components of the British media were discrediting themselves by promoting the "massacre myth" of the Jenin refugee camp, CBC continued to act far more responsibly. It was closer in accuracy and fairness to the U.S. media from which, ironically, it often likes to distinguish itself.

On April 19, the day the Israeli army pulled out of Jenin, Neil MacDonald accurately reported: "A legend is in the making of a massacre of hundreds of dead. But the true number would appear to be more like 40 or 50, mostly armed fighters and of course some innocents." Macdonald described the genuine human tragedy wrought by the destruction in Jenin.

Unfortunately, he failed to explain that Jenin was the point of origin for 23 suicide bombing attacks, necessitating sustained combat to eliminate terrorist cells ensconced among civilians in the camp.

Still, Macdonald concluded his report by noting that the Israeli army lost 23 soldiers who were "young men... sacrificed because commanders chose to fight selectively and not carpet bomb the entire population of the refugee camp into oblivion."

And while I wrote earlier in this space that CBC, in the week of April 14, failed to show Israeli aerial footage of Jenin indicating that only a small area of the refugee camp had been devastated, Terry Milewski's report of April 20 did present that film. It also included Israel's statement that "about 95, 96 buildings of the 1,200 in the camp were damaged," a figure far less than Macdonald's claim, in his April 18 report, that "hundreds of buildings were destroyed."

Towards the end of April, reports were already emerging from human rights groups that they could find no evidence of a "massacre."

On April 30, Paul Hunter reported on United Nations Secretary-General Kofi Annan's plan to scrap a mission to Jenin. In the absence of a UN investigation, Hunter wondered "who to believe?" among the competing claims of Palestinians still alleging a massacre. Palestinian Authority minister Saeb Erekat was featured claiming that Israel was trying to cover up "war crimes and massacres." Foreign Minister Shimon Peres was then shown denouncing such a "blood libel against the Jewish people, against Israel."

Hunter cited Israel's claim that only "50 Palestinians and just over 20 Israeli soldiers" died, and admitted that "there's no evidence of anything more." But if that's so, why did he repeat the outrageous accusation from an unidentified Palestinian woman first reported nearly three weeks before: "All the young men are gone. The Israelis killed them, picked up their bodies with bulldozers and threw them in the sewage."

By this time, the news media, knowing that there was no evidence of a massacre, might have steered clear of such sensationalism.

One more illustration of international ambivalence about the Jenin story: Human Rights Watch issued statements in early May indicating that it found no evidence of a massacre, but raised the charge of war crimes that Israel also denounced.

Covering the Human Rights Watch story, Peter Mansbridge noted Israel's rejection of the war crimes charge, and that it questioned "why Palestinians aren't subject to the same scrutiny."

A good question, indeed.

Paul Michaels is director of communications for the Canada-Israel Committee.

Harts maintain love affair with Hamilton community

By JULIA KOLLEK
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — When Sharon and Lawrence Hart moved to Hamilton in 1987, they almost immediately began volunteering for a variety of Jewish organizations.

The couple, who are admired by many in the community, were honoured at the recent Jewish National Fund (JNF) Negev Dinner in recognition of their longtime dedication and commitment.

Sharon, who is currently national vice-president of JNF of Canada and also serves as national chair of JNF's centennial committee, recently represented Canada at the world conference of worldwide JNF leaders in Jerusalem. Over the past 15 years, she has led many JNF committees, organized Negev dinners and has chaired Tu b'Shvat telethons and blue box campaigns. In 1998, she was awarded the prestigious Bernard Bloomfield Medal for Meritorious Service by JNF Canada. She has also served as vice-president of the Hamilton JCC, and presided over the Nitsan chapter of Na'amat as well as Hamilton Hebrew Academy's parent teacher association. Despite her busy schedule, she finds time to relax by playing tennis with friends at the JCC.

Lawrence currently chairs the public affairs committee of the Hamilton Jewish Federation and is a member of the community editorial board of the Hamilton Spectator, where he is a regular columnist. Before taking on his current term as Maccabi Canada president, he served a three-year term as national president of B'nai Brith Canada (BBC). For several years, he was chair of the organization's Institute for International Affairs and in 1997, he co-chaired the organization's first international conference on hate on the Internet. He has sat on the board of numerous organizations, including the United Jewish Appeal, Shalom Village and the local JNF, and has sat on the executives of the Canada-Israel Committee and Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region.

The Harts both grew up in households that were very committed to charitable causes and the Jewish world. Sharon's grandparents moved to Israel in 1911 from White Russia and were among the founders of Nachalat Ganim, now part of modern-day Ramat Gan, which today has a street named in memory of her grandfather, Menachem Yitzchak Levin.

Sharon's mother, Haya Levin, the youngest of seven, was the first child in her family to have been born in Israel. There she met and married Chaim Marcovitz. Sharon's father, who was a labour camp survivor from Romania. The couple later joined Chaim's family in Canada.

"From a young age, I have always felt a sense of responsibility, a need to be involved with our local community and with Israel," Sharon says.

"It was amazing for my parents to see the creation of the State of Israel and that made a great impact on our Jewish identity and pride. Israel is such an incredible place. If you think about it, the country has been in a state of war since its birth, and despite that – look at how much has been achieved."

Sharon grew up in Montreal and moved to Toronto with her family when she was 15. She graduated from the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) at the top of her class, and went on to pursue a medical career in family practice and obstetrics at the University of Toronto, where she met Lawrence. The couple's first date was in a falafel restaurant on erev Yom Kippur; within a year they were engaged. They were married in 1981.

Lawrence was born and raised in Johannesburg, South Africa. His parents, Gerald and Sorel (Berkowitz) were first generation South Africans. There was always a strong sense of Jewish values, particularly tzedakah, in their household, Lawrence says.

"I was born just after midnight on January 1, [1952], and as was traditional for the first arrival of the new year, my mother was presented with a hamper of baby products from a local department store, which she immediately donated to a mother and child shelter," he says.

"While that was an example of her tzedakah, it later impressed me that right from birth, I had somehow become involved with charitable giving."

After graduating from medical school in Johannesburg, Lawrence came to Canada for specialist training. In addition to a residency in internal medicine, he completed both a fellowship in rheumatology and a master's degree in clinical epidemiology and biostatistics at McMaster University. He then pursued further post-doctoral training at the Hammersmith Hospital in London, England. He is now associate professor of medicine at McMaster and director of the rheumatic disease unit at Chedoke Division, Hamilton Health Sciences.

An enthusiastic runner, Lawrence has competed at every distance, from 5 km road races to 92 km marathons. His most memorable races, he says, include the Comrades Marathon, the Boston Marathon and the New York Marathon. He has just returned from from Cape Breton where he was part of a 17-person team that completed the 298 km Cabot Trail relay race.

As the recently elected national president of Maccabi Canada, Lawrence hopes to publicize the organization's projects that are aimed at increasing Jewish identity, Jewish unity and awareness of Israel.

"For too long, Maccabi has been regarded as an organization that only sends athletes to Israel," he says. "What goes mostly unnoticed is that it actually has a strong youth infrastructure that stretches across the world."

In addition to their careers and volunteer work, the Harts have also raised three daughters: Lara, 19, Ilana, 17, and Yael, 14. Lara has just completed her first year at the University of Toronto majoring in life sciences, Ilana will be graduating from CHAT this month and going to U of T in September and Yael is in her last year at the Hamilton Hebrew Academy.

Accomplished dancers in tap, jazz and ballet, they have each danced competitively for more than a decade and have won medals at many local and provincial competitions.

Like their parents, the Hart girls are longtime volunteers. They have helped out many organizations, both Jewish and non-Jewish, as well as with JNF blue box collections and Tu b'Shvat telethons.

Israel remains an important focus of family life. Sharon and Lawrence have tried to instil a love of Israel in their children. They have made many trips to Israel, together and individually. Lara spent four months in Israel last year on the Ramah Senior Educational Experience program.

"We've tried to set an example for them from a young age, giving them a sense of immense pride in their Jewish identity and a profound love of Israel," Sharon says.

Though the Harts were honoured to receive the JNF tribute, that focus – as always for this family – is firmly in place.

"This is all about kavod Am Yisrael," Sharon says. "This is about taking pride in one's homeland."

אף אחד מאיתנו אינו תמים, וחלקינו אפילו זוכרים שבמלחמת העולם חיו יחסי מסחר בין חברות אמריקאיות וגרמניה הנאצית. ובכל זאת בא לחקיא מהמחשבה שהאמריקאיים, ואולי גם ארצות אחרות, מאפשרות משטחן סיוע ישיר לטרור הפלשתינאי.

האיש ששינה את החיסטוריה

אני נסיע להעביר חרצאה רפואית במערב אונטאריו ושם לי מוסיקה ישראלית. בלי משים אני שוב באותו סתיו נורא, שומע את שלמה ארצי שר " איפה ישנם עוד אנשים כמו האיש החזה" וכל חקחל שר איתו לזכרו של רבין, ושומעים קולות ברקים וגשם ואיש לא זז.

ובחוך ליד אגם ירוק ירד גשם, וחגשם של אז מתערבב בגשם של עכשיו, ואני חושב לעצמי: חרוצח עמיר הצליח חצלחה שלמה- חוא שינה את מהלך החיסטוריה בלחיצת חדק אחת. אין לי ספק שלו היה נשאר יצחק רבין בחיים, היה חוא מצליח להשלים את המלאכה ולחביא לנורמאליזציה בין ישראל ופלשתין. אבל מה שחרס טיפש אחד לא יצליחו אלפי חכמים לתקן. אלא שעמיר אינו טיפש. חוא חשיג , מבחינתו ומבחינת אנשים שכמותו חצלחה מלאה. רק מה, חצלחתו המושלמת היא כשלוננו חמחלט. מאות חישראלים שנטבחו מאז קיפחו את חייחם בגלל אותו קליע שירה עמיר. על כך אמר איש חניו יורק טיימס תום פרידמן: חמזרח חתיכון חוא כמו פאזל מסובך שחצליח רבין לחרכיב, ואז בא כלב וכשכוש וב אחד חרס אותו ואולי גם אכל כמה חלקים, ואיש אינו יודע איך לחרכיב אותו חזרח, או אם אפשר בכלל לחרכיבו שוב. אבל שישאר בינינו.

קטע ששלח לי ג'רי ארבוס:

אתה נסע באוטו חמירוץ חקטן שלך בשלוש בבוקר, ופתאום רואה בתחנת אוטובוס שלושה אנשים: אישה זקנה שברור לך שאם לא תוענר במחירות לבית חולים- היא תמות. לידה עומד חבר טוב שחציל את חייך ומעולם לא יצא לך להשיב לו כגמולו, למרות שתמיד חלמת על אפשרות כזאת. ולידם עומדת אשת חלומותיך- אישה שברור לך שיחיו לך חיים מאוד מאושרים לידה.

מסיבה כל שחיא (כמו שקורה בחידונים טפשיים), מותר לך לחסיע רק אדם אחד, ואתה לא יכול לחזור פעמיים. את מי חיית לוקח?

האם חיית מציל את חזקנה, גומל טובה לחבר טוב, או בוחר באשת חלומותיך? שאלה זו נשאלה בבחינת כניסה למשרה מאוד יוקרתית. זכה במשרה אדם שחיה חיחיד שענה את חתשובה המסוימת החיא. ובכן- חינה מה שחוא אמר:

חייתי נותן את מפתחות חאוטו לַחבר חטוב ומבקש ממנו שיביא את חזקנה לבית חולים, ואני חייתי נשאר עם האישה עד לסוף חטוב..... וחמסקנה?

תמיד לחפש פיתרון מקורי שאינו נופל בתוך חטור חמקובל. פיתרון שאינו פותח לחשוב בכיוון חדש.....

עד כאן חסיפור, ועכשיו פירוש רש"י (נֶעֱנוּ מִדְּבַשׁ קוֹרְנֵן) :

איך אתה יכול לדעת במבט אחד דרך חלון מכונית שתאישה חזו חיא אשת חייך! לפי חמראה חחיצוני- כמעט בטוח שחייך לא יהיו חיים- לכל חיותר אתה יכול לחניח שיהיה לך מעניין לילה/ יום/ חודש.

ומה פירוש חדבר שחמקרה חזה שימש בבחירת מועמד למשרה יוקרתית? מראש החליטו שחמישרה חזאת אינה עבור אישה- סיכוי שאתנה יוקרתית- לכל חיותר מְשַׁרֶת כומר או מוחל או ראש חליכוד. אבל שישאר בינינו.

New Bronfman prize to award future leaders

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – When Charles Bronfman's two children and son-in-law told him what his 70th birthday present was in June 2001 in Jerusalem, he immediately burst into tears.

As his daughter Ellen and her husband Andrew Hauptman joked, it was not a natty tie that had her father welling up.

Instead, as announced officially June 14 from Montreal, just 13 days before their father's 71st birthday, the gift was an annual Charles Bronfman Prize, a $100,000 (US) award that, beginning in May 2003, will go to individuals or groups of individuals "who inspire the emerging generation of Jewish people through the excellence of their achievements."

In a three-way conference call, Bronfman's son Stephen in Montreal, Ellen, in London, and Hauptman, in Los Angeles, explained how they wanted the prize to honour and reflect their father's values and carry on his legacy of commitment to Jewish continuity.

"He was so happy his kids were doing something on such a large scale for him, and he was embarrassed and he was thrilled, and all the emotions came out," said Stephen, chair of the Montreal-based Claridge SRB Investments Inc. "It was quite something."

Stephen said the idea for the prize came after a lot of "mulling over" by the family.

"It would have been easily doable to have a quick event and give away some money and have a nice evening, but that's not what we wanted to do," he said.

"We wanted to plan something that would have a lasting effect, not only in the prize itself, but in the prizewinners… to do something everlasting."

A "high-level" panel of five international judges – yet to be named – will choose the recipient of the prize after a group of "selectors" working within the independent, New York-based Charles Bronfman Prize Foundation, which is administering the award, "whittle" a larger list of names down, Stephen said.

The Bronfman children and Hauptman, president and CEO of the Montreal- and London-based investment company Andell Ltd., are chairing the foundation, but will not have a say in either the list of nominees or the winner.

"It will not be an open nomination," said Ellen, who is chair of Andell Ltd., adding that the candidates will be sought from a variety of institutions.

The recipient will be someone who has distinguished him- or herself in science, the arts, literature, scholarship or humanitarian endeavours.

They are looking for, according to the prize's official mission statement, individuals or a "team" of any nationality, religion or cultural background "whose accomplishments set a standard for the next generation of young Jews and whose endeavours are emblematic of the values and regard for excellence in the Jewish world."

Hauptman said the jury will look for three elements: a commitment to the entire Jewish people, regardless of background; the impact of the potential recipient's work on the global scene; and impact on the next generation.

No one can apply for the prize, and the recipient(s) must be under 50 years old.

"We didn't want the prize to be a lifetime achievement award," Hauptman said. "We wanted the recipients to be young enough to be role models.

"It's fair to say that none of us had in mind creating a 'vanity' prize or giving a prize to someone who's gotten 16 other prizes."

Over the last year of intensive meetings and consultations, he said, the goal "was to focus on someone with Jewish values, who has a global orientation, and, most importantly, will empower and inspire the next generation."

Stephen said his father has done just that and emerged as a "hero" in the eyes of many through such projects as Birthright Israel, which has sent 25,000 young Jews on free trips to Israel.

Stephen said the prize process will not end with the award. The work of the recipient – "who might be quite unknown," he said – will be highlighted to the world and "we will try to build on that, to let the recipient get a bit of spotlight out of what they're doing."

Hauptman said, 'We expect when the time comes to announce the recipient, that he or she will want to share their story: what they do, their mission, the importance of their work."

Jewish scientists among winners of Canadian research award

By LAUREN KRAMER
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Two Jewish professors at the University of Toronto are among 20 researchers in science and engineering aged 40 and under and working in Canada who have been chosen by the Canadian Institute for Advanced Research (CIAR) to receive its Young Explorers' Prize.

The winners, who were selected by a panel of international judges unaffiliated with the CIAR, were honoured in a ceremony earlier this week in Victoria as part of the institute's 20th anniversary.

They will each get about $2,000.

Israeli-born Daniel Lidar, 34, is an assistant professor of chemistry at U of T who studies quantum information processors. Predicted to be the computers of the future, they are highly sophisticated devices that will be able to perform computations that present-day computers can't, such as cracking the most sophisticated encryption schemes or searching large random lists.

Lidar is working to make future quantum computers more robust in order to protect them against external disturbances that would cause them to malfunction.

"I take the award to signify a recognition of past scientific contributions, but foremost as a recognition of potential and promise," said Lidar, who has a PhD in physics from Hebrew University.

Another Jewish winner from U of T is Molly Shoichet, whose focus is promoting nerve regeneration after spinal cord injury. The 37-year-old mother of two holds a Canada Research Chair in tissue engineering and is an associate professor of chemical engineering and applied chemistry.

"By collaborating with surgeons and scientists, I believe we can use science and engineering with advanced surgical techniques to overcome devastating disorders like spinal cord injury," she said.

She's optimistic about achieving her two main goals – to improve function in paralyzed individuals who suffer from spinal cord injury, and to ultimately find a cure for paralysis.

Asked how far science is from that goal, she said: "I think we will find a cure, and that by having engineers, scientists and surgeons working closely together, we will achieve our goals."

The CIAR was founded in 1982 by a group of Canadian academics and business people as a private sector initiative. According to its Web site, it aims "to help top Canadian researchers connect with each other and their international peers to collaborate on globally significant challenges."

CIAR presently has 198 members, 116 in Canada and 82 outside the country.

PA not basis for Palestinian state, says Rice

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — U.S. President George W. Bush will outline his vision for peace between Israel and the Palestinians next week, but the administration does not see Yasser Arafat's Palestinian Authority as the basis for a future Palestinian state, national security advisor Condoleezza Rice told the Mercury News.

"Frankly, the Palestinian Authority, which is corrupt and cavorts with terror... is not the basis for a Palestinian state moving forward," Rice said in a report posted on the daily's Web site Saturday.

Rice repeated the U.S. government's opposition to settlements in the territories and added that Israel also has a responsibility to conditions faced by Palestinians, including easing freedom of movement.

"Israel is going to have to do some very hard things," Rice said. "They're going to have to make some hard choices about how much it's ready for peace, too."

While the Bush administration has become more engaged in the peace process since Bush was first elected, Rice said they would not pursue the approach attempted by former U.S. president Bill Clinton when he hosted Arafat and former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak at Camp David.

"We're not going back down that road," Rice said. "And I would challenge anybody to tell us, 'Yeah, you ought to go back down that road,' given where it ended up."

According to the report, Rice indicated that the United States does not see the possibility for a rapid movement toward a permanent agreement. She said conditions were not ripe for the United States to convene a full-scale peace conference to be attended by heads of state.

Instead, the Bush administration will work to create democratic institutions for the Palestinians. Arafat's role, if any, remains to be determined.

"Everybody focuses too much on the personality. If you build the institutions and they are legitimate, reformed institutions, they will serve the Palestinian people better, and Arafat... the chips will fall where they may," she said.

In related developments, Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon told Sunday's cabinet meeting in Jerusalem that "the conditions are not ripe for the establishment of any kind of Palestinian state."

Sharon was speaking during a report to ministers about his trip to Washington last week, and his White House meeting with Bush.

In that meeting, Sharon told Bush that a Palestinian state can only come once Palestinian violence stops, serious reforms are implemented and general elections are held, cabinet secretary Gideon Saar said.

"I clarified that this is not the time for any type of Palestinian state," Sharon said, according to Saar.

At Sunday's cabinet meeting, Sharon acquiesced to a request by minister David Levy, who asked for a discussion to be held in the next few days on the convening of the planned regional peace conference.

Meanwhile, Bush is set to call for the establishment of a temporary Palestinian state, along with a call for Israel to freeze settlement building in the West Bank. Diplomatic activity in Washington has been focused on preparing Bush's speech for this week. Israel, Egypt, Saudi Arabia, and the PA have tried to influence the address, which has stirred heated debate among top Bush administration officials.

According to sources in Jerusalem, the Bush administration has promised Saudi Arabia that it will pressure Israel to halt settlement activity. Before Sharon's visit to Washington last week, the administration asked several Israeli sources whether the prime minister would be willing to make a goodwill gesture and freeze the settlements. This would allow Bush to praise the move in his speech, rather that criticizing continued settlement expansion. Sharon rejected the suggestion, and the president decided against raising the issue during their meeting.

For his part, Sharon sees two states in his vision for the next decade – Israel and Palestine – living in peace, he told U.S. officials during his visit to Washington last week. He said a solution must be found in a piecemeal fashion.

The stages on the road to peace include an end to violence and incitement, reform of the PA, diplomatic negotiations leading to recognition of a Palestinian state without borders, and finally, talks about setting borders, he said.

It appears from this outline that Sharon has accepted the proposal that recognition of a provisional Palestinian state ought to be the first step in diplomatic negotiations, but he told Bush he cannot publicly support a provisional Palestinian state at this stage, as he did last year, due to the escalation of terror attacks over the past 12 months.

He added he will not criticize Bush if he expresses support for the provisional state idea during his coming speech on the Middle East. Sharon proposed to Bush an outline for renewed talks with the Palestinians.

Work begins on West Bank fence amid charges it sets political border

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — As bulldozers began scooping out earth to build a security fence between Israel and the West Bank, Israeli cabinet ministers sparred over the potential political implications of the barrier.

Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer reiterated at Sunday's weekly cabinet meeting that the fence is aimed at preventing Palestinian terrorists from entering Israel.

But right-wing ministers were sharply critical of the fence, saying it would leave Jewish settlements on the wrong side of the barrier and would establish a de facto border.

"This is not a security fence, but an outline for a withdrawal through which a terrorist state will be established," said cabinet minister Efraim Eitam, a member of the National Religious Party.

If Israel wants to build a fence, it should build fences around Palestinian towns and cities, Eitam added.

Science Minister Matan Vilnai, a member of the Labor party, dismissed the claims.

"The fence is not a border, but an obstacle that will prevent terrorists from slipping into Israel," Vilnai said.

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said the security cabinet would meet in the coming days to hold further discussions about the fence.

After bulldozers worked for several days clearing land at a site near the northern West Bank, Israel officially launched construction of the fence on Sunday.

Ben-Eliezer toured the construction site for the inauguration of the $220-million project.

"The aim is to separate only from a security point of view. Security separation, not political separation," Ben-Eliezer told reporters.

The first section of fence will run about 75 miles, from northeast of Tel Aviv to southeast of Haifa.

A nearly 10-mile-long barrier in the Jerusalem area has also been approved by the government.

Ditches, patrol paths and electronic surveillance devices are also planned.

According to the director general of Israel's Defence Ministry, Amos Yaron, the fence is not following the border that existed before the 1967 Six Day War. Instead, he said, the fence would be part of a three- to nine-mile-wide "seam" or buffer straddling the border.

During Sunday's cabinet meeting, Sharon also described the fence as part of the government's overall plan to establish buffer zones.

In related developments, two Israeli soldiers were killed over the weekend, in a clash with Palestinians in the Gaza Strip.

The soldiers were identified as Staff-Sgt. Hezki Guttman, 22, of Beit El and Sgt. Alexei Gladkov, 20, of Be'er Sheva.

Four other Israeli soldiers were wounded and one Hamas gunman was killed in Saturday's clash.

The fight took place in northern Gaza, where earlier in the day Israeli security forces foiled a terrorist attack.

In that incident, soldiers identified a suspicious car near the settlement of Dugit and opened fire, causing the explosives inside to detonate. The vehicle contained more than 330 pounds of explosives as well as mortar shells. It was the third large car bomb found in recent days by Israeli forces in northern Gaza.

In another development over the weekend, Israeli troops arrested a Palestinian suspected of killing four people in a terrorist attack on a settlement near Hebron.

The Palestinian is suspected of taking part in an infiltration of the settlement of Dura in late April, in which four people, including a five-year-old girl, were killed and seven others wounded.

And in another incident on Sunday, Israeli soldiers shot and killed a Palestinian man after he ignored orders to stop at a checkpoint in the Jordan Valley.

The man was carrying a suspicious-looking bag and did not stop when warning shots were fired, according to an army spokesperson. Two other Palestinians who fled the scene were later apprehended.

New Hague court may indict settlers for war crimes

By GIDEON ALON
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israelis could be indicted by the new International Criminal Court (ICC) starting next month, when the court is formally inaugurated, Attorney General Elyakim Rubinstein warned at a meeting of the Knesset Constitution Committee last week.

Among other items, Rubinstein said, the court could decide to try Jewish settlers who move to the territories after June 30, since one article of the treaty establishing the court defines the settlements as a war crime (the June 30 cutoff stems from the fact that the court has jurisdiction only over acts committed after its inauguration on July 1). It could also indict Israel Defence Forces soldiers and officers involved in operations like the one in Jenin during Operation Defensive Shield.

Overall, Rubinstein stressed, "I have faith in the 'purity of arms' of IDF soldiers," and in cases where soldiers were found to have violated orders, they have been put on trial (according to the ICC treaty, the court cannot indict anyone who has already been subjected to genuine legal proceedings in his home country).

Since the start of the intifadah in September 2000, 140 soldiers have been investigated for crimes such as looting, and some have been indicted, Rubinstein said.

'The international court is a great unknown for us'

"[But] the international court is a great unknown for us," he said. "We don't know who the judges will be or who the prosecutors will be. We don't know what it will mean for the Jewish settlements in Judea, Samaria and Gaza or for the neighbourhoods of Jerusalem that were set up over the Green Line following the Six Day War."

Rubinstein stressed that Israel has not ratified the ICC treaty not because it has anything to hide, but out of fear that the court would be guided by political rather than strictly legal considerations. The decision not to ratify will reduce the danger represented by the court, but will not eliminate it entirely, he said.

Deputy Attorney General Rachel Sukar explained that had Israel ratified the treaty, it would be obliged to assist the court by, for instance, handing over any documents it requested. But non-ratification does not provide immunity from prosecution by the court.

The court also does not recognize diplomatic immunity, so even a sitting prime minister could be indicted, she said.

Prof. Ruth Lapidoth, an expert in international law, said that based on the list of candidates for seats on the ICC's bench, Israel cannot be confident that the court's judges will rule in a fair and unbiased manner.

State Prosecutor Edna Arbel said the establishment of the court obligates the state to get ready to provide legal representation for any soldier indicted by the ICC for faithfully executing the government's orders in the territories. The Justice Ministry has set up a special task force headed by Sukar to prepare for the court's inauguration, and the team will include representatives of the Foreign Ministry and the Judge Advocate General's Office.

But Alan Baker, the Foreign Ministry's legal adviser, warned against creating unnecessary panic over the court. Even though it is being inaugurated on July 1, it will only begin working in about a year, he said.

Committee chairman Ophir Pines-Paz of the Labour party said the ICC's establishment requires Israel to change its policy regarding the settlements to avoid becoming embroiled in legal and political problems.

MK Shaul Yahalom (National Religious Party) suggested that the Justice Ministry set up a database of complaints against terrorists who have murdered innocent civilians and transfer them to the court. For instance, he said, the ICC should be asked to indict Tanzim leader Marwan Barghouti. These complaints could serve as an acid test for determining whether the court is objective or politically biased, Yahalom said.

Israel presents UN with missile stance

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel last week submitted its official position on missiles to the United Nations for the first time, a move intended as a contribution to arms control discussions in various international forums.

In its statement, Israel proposed starting regional discussions about missiles, with the aim of developing confidence-building measures and decreasing tensions related to missile threats. It was drafted by the Foreign Ministry's strategic issues division in co-ordination with the defence minister.

The Israeli statement opens with expressions of concern about the expanding exports of ballistic missiles to states in the region. This proliferation of missiles has "created a major threat to our national security," the statement says.

According to the document, the export of knowledge and equipment to states in the Middle East has in recent years increased the number of missiles that could carry non-conventional warheads, posing threats to Israel and to regional stability.

Israel has rejected demands aired in various international forums calling on it to introduce full "transparency and accountability" in its missile test reports as a first step toward confidence-building and allaying regional tensions, arguing that arms control arrangements must take into account the region's special circumstances.

The concept of full accountability does not apply to the region, Israel argues, since disclosures about missile tests could be interpreted as threatening gestures rather than as a step to ease tensions.

Israel wants the international community to step up efforts to monitor and supervise the export of missile equipment and expertise. Efforts so far to limit missile proliferation in the region have been ineffective, Israel says.

Israel is committed to the Missile Technology Control Regime (MTCR) and does not export offensive forms of missile technology. Israeli officials charge that "problematic states in the region" supply missile technology to nearby states.

"In principle, Israel supports any genuine initiative that is designed to effectively prevent the proliferation of ballistic missiles, particularly in the Middle East," the statement says. The document calls for meetings to discuss security matters and to formulate confidence-building measures in the missiles sphere.

Officials from 10 states are meeting this week in Madrid to complete discussions about international guidelines governing missile proliferation. Israel has incorporated in the draft guidelines formulations that refer to regional arrangements, along with global codes of conduct.

A group of experts, which was established by the UN two years ago to deal with missiles issues, will meet in New York in early July to wrap up its report.

Auschwitz group vows to combat rising anti-Semitism across Europe

By TOBY AXELROD
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BERLIN — A group representing Auschwitz survivors will move its headquarters here as part of its efforts to intensify the battle against anti-Semitism and xenophobia in Europe.

"The former inmates of the camps felt an urgent need to act," Christoph Heubner, the executive vice-president of the International Auschwitz Committee, said last Friday at the group's general meeting. "They are getting anxious about what is going on at the moment, what is coming back in Europe."

Felt an urgent need to act

The committee, founded in 1952, works to help support Auschwitz survivors and further Holocaust education.

In addition to increasing its emphasis on eyewitness testimony and sponsoring visits to concentration camp memorials, the committee intends to step up political lobbying for additional Holocaust education.

"We will also be involved in the public discussion about anti-Semitism in every European society," Heubner said.

Education about Jewish life and the Holocaust can help combat the current rise in anti-Semitism in Europe, the group's leaders say.

Often, Heubner said in an interview, non-Jewish Germans have their first encounter with Jews during meetings with Holocaust survivors.

"These people talk about Jewish life in European countries, how enriching it was," he said. "Talking about Jewish life does not only mean Auschwitz and death and horrifying things. It also means people living together."

Last Friday's announcement of the committee's move from Austria to Germany, where an estimated 100,000 Jews live, came during the group's meeting in Oswiecim – the town in Poland where Auschwitz was located.

At the meeting, Noah Flug, a leader of Holocaust survivors in Israel, was elected president of the group.

Part of the new office's function would be to better co-ordinate the activities of national branches, said Heubner, a 50-year-old German Protestant whose father, traumatized by his experience as a Nazi soldier, "educated his children in a pacifistic tradition."

Taking this tradition to heart, Heubner volunteered when he was a young man with the German Protestant group Action Reconciliation, which sends young Germans around the world to work with Holocaust survivors.

Today, Heubner – a writer by profession – works with the International Youth Meeting Center in Auschwitz.

Many educators and survivor groups agree there is a drastic need for improvement in Holocaust education.

There is apparently a demand for information about Jewish life in Germany, judging by the more than 500,000 visitors to Berlin's new Jewish Museum since it opened in September 2001.

But critics say it is often easier for the general public to deal with dead Jews than living ones.

Responding to increasing public anti-Semitism, Paul Spiegel, head of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, has called for a drastic overhaul in the school curriculum, so that it includes lessons about Judaism and Jewish life.

In an interview, Spiegel said there are "shocking" gaps in knowledge about Judaism among school children.

Partly as a result of ignorance, he said, "the threshold for anti-Jewish statements is not merely lower, it is non-existent."

WZO to tackle thorny issues this week

By RACHEL POMERANCE
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — When Jews from around the world gather in Jerusalem this week for the 34th World Zionist Congress, their presence will be seen as an expression of unity and solidarity with the embattled Jewish state.

Yet one of the major challenges will be to bridge the gaps of the various parties and forge consensus over how to define Israel as a Jewish and democratic state.

Groups as diverse as Likud, the Conservative movement and the Orthodox have submitted resolutions on the subject, clearly with different goals in mind.

"Although clearly Israel is under attack and we need to pull together," the congress can't afford to "completely ignore the agenda of the Zionist movement," including environmentalism, the gap between the rich and the poor and the religious-secular divide, said Robert Golub, executive director of Mercaz USA, the Zionist arm of the Conservative movement.

Known to many as the parliament of the Jewish people, the 750-seat World Zionist Congress, which determines policies and programs of world Jewry, convenes every four to five years in Jerusalem.

This year's gathering is being held June 17-20 at a time of much angst over the future of Israel and the Jewish people.

But while the issues of global anti-Semitism and external threats to Israel will shape much of the agenda, the labyrinth of policy-making and political plotting that traditionally characterizes the congress is expected to happen as usual this year.

At the congress, ideological groups team up to determine policies of the World Zionist Organization (WZO), which holds half the decision-making power of the Jewish Agency for Israel.

That means influence over the agency's $350 million budget, which focuses on immigration and absorption and worldwide religious, political and educational programs.

Ammiel Hirsch, executive director of ARZA/World Union, the Zionist branch of the Reform movement, agreed with Golub.

There's an "urgent need for world Jewry to come together in solidarity," and their presence in Israel will go a long way toward that end, he said.

But Hirsch said he feared wartime talk would trump the discussion of social issues like pluralism, the acceptance by Israel of non-Orthodox denominations and civil rights.

Hirsch said he strongly supports the notion that "Israel was born a Jewish state and should remain a Jewish state in its very founding definition."

That's "contrary to the assertion of those post-Zionist Jews and some in the Arab community who claim that to define Israel as a Jewish state diminishes its full democratic character and contrary to those religious Jews, some of whom claim Israel should be a halachic state governed by Jewish law and not democratic law," he said.

But Harvey Blitz, president of the Orthodox Union and a delegate on the slate of the Religious Zionists of America, anticipates his faction will take issue with any resolution that endorses equal rights for all denominations and religions.

Blitz said he thinks it is wrong to hold such a divisive debate during such turbulent times in Israel.

"To us, saying Israel is supposed to be a Jewish state has not just ethnic meaning, but religious meaning.

"Israel needs to be a Jewish state and there needs to be a consideration of religious needs and requirements," he said.

While some view the existence of so many factions within the congress as a sign of weakness, many are committed to the social debates that they say signify the relevancy of this democratic organization.

Zionism has always been about a "great deal more than creating a safe refuge for Jews to live in," said David Breakstone, the Jerusalem-based liaison between the WZO and Zionist federations, or national affiliates.

The WZO is concerned with engaging "those living abroad to be involved personally and meaningfully in shaping the society that we have here," and in shaping a chevrah l'mofet, or exemplary society, in Israel, he said.

The group has added another force to rejuvenate this year's congress – and the movement as a whole.

This year, 25 per cent of the 750 delegates will be below the age of 30.

During the elections, which were available on the Internet to boost voter turnout, the election slates reserved at least a quarter of their delegate slots for those under 30, according to a new mandate.

"We believe that if there won't be empowerment of youth that will bring new spirit to the goals of the Zionist movement, the movement won't hold up for much longer," said Haim Hayet, a Meretz party delegate of the Congress who serves as chairman of the youth department for the WZO.

The Week in Israel

June 10

• A study released by Asher Cohen of Bar Ilan University found that 72 per cent of Israel's population is Jewish, rather than the 81 per cent figure cited by the Central Bureau of Statistics. The Bar Ilan figure reflects the integration into Israeli society of non-Jewish immigrants from the FSU, foreign workers working in the country and Palestinians living illegally in Israel.

June 11

• A teenager was killed and at least eight people were wounded when a suicide bomber struck outside a restaurant in Herzliya.

• Cafe Moment reopened in Jerusalem three months after it was destroyed in a suicide bombing. Eleven people were killed and more than 50 others injured in the March attack.

June 12

• Security forces thwarted a large terrorist attack in the Gaza Strip. Soldiers spotted seven armed Palestinians approaching Netzarim and opened fire, killing four of them. The three others fled; one later died of his wounds.

• The army withdrew from the Palestinian Authority's headquarters in Ramallah, ending a two-day siege that began after a suicide bombing in Herzliyah.

June 13

• Five Israeli soldiers were wounded in incidents in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

June 14

• B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) and Christians for Israel, in Israel for a joint mission, criticized the Canadian government's Middle East policy at a press conference in Jerusalem. BBC also announced the formation of a strategic alliance with Christians for Israel to try to change Canada's foreign policy on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Israel Museum director brings art to Toronto

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Thanks to a gift from a Jewish refugee from the Arab world, the Israel Museum in Jerusalem has amassed one of the world's greatest collections of Dada and Surrealist art.

Two hundred and fifty of these pieces, from the Vera, Silvia and Arturo Schwarz collection, are currently on display at the Art Gallery of Ontario.

They form part of an exhibition entitled Surrealist Summer, which opened on June 14 and runs until Sept. 8.

Surrealist Summer also showcases Dada and Surrealistic works from the AGO's existing collection and from the collection of Allan Gotlieb of Toronto.

In all, visitors can view more than 400 Dada and Surrealist works from World War I to the present by artists ranging from Salvador Dali to Roberto Matta.

"We are proud to show such extraordinary Dada and Surrealist works," said Matthew Teitelbaum, director of the AGO.

"These movements were born from a spirit of rebelliousness with society and a desire to expand the boundaries of art into the realm of the imagination. It is a spirit that is important still and alive to us through ideas that continue to inspire contemporary artists."

The Schwarz collection at the AGO, under the name of Dreaming with Open Eyes, places emphasis on works by Marcel Duchamp and Man Ray, who exerted an enormous impact on Dada and Surrealism.

The Israel Museum, Israel's largest cultural institution, acquired the Schwarz collection in 1998, when Israel marked its 50th anniversary of statehood.

Born in 1924, Arturo Schwarz was expelled from Egypt in 1949, after the first Arab-Israeli war, and settled in Milan, Italy.

In the early 1950s, he opened a publishing house and a bookstore, which evolved into the Schwarz gallery and presented work by leading Dada, Surrealist and contemporary artists.

The Schwarz collection consists of 750 paintings, 1,500 pieces of ephemera and 2,000 books, said James Snyder, who has been director of the Israel Museum since 1996.

In an interview, Snyder said Schwarz donated the collection out of love to Israel.

"He went to Italy through Israel, and I think he left a part of his heart in Israel," Snyder said of Schwarz, who attended the opening of Surrealist Summer last week.

James Snyder

"He visited the Israel Museum in the 1970s, and decided he wanted to make us the major repository of Dada and Surrealist art," Snyder added.

According to an AGO press release, the Schwarz collection has few equals in scope and quality.

Before coming to Toronto, it was exhibited in Jerusalem and San Francisco.

"We're considering adding another venue after its success in San Francisco," said Snyder, who was previously deputy director for planning and expansion support at the Museum of Modern Art in New York City.

A native of Pittsburgh, Pa., Snyder joined the Israel Museum because he was impressed by the calibre of its collections and the physical beauty of its setting in the wooded hills of Jerusalem.

"I was bowled over," he said.

He and his wife, Tina Davis, a graphic designer specializing in art book design, have two children, and reside in Jerusalem.

Currently, Snyder is presiding over a $15 million (US) renewal program at the Israel Museum, whose 20-acre campus includes a 500,000-square-foot facility for exhibitions and collections and a five-acre outdoor sculpture garden.

According to Snyder, the museum has plans to renovate the Shrine of the Book, housing the Dead Sea Scrolls, as well as the museum's main auditorium.

It also plans to build a new entrance and improve parking and restroom facilities.

Snyder, a Harvard graduate born in 1952, said that local and overseas donors provide 100 per cent of its capital development program and 60 per cent of its annual budget.

The Canadian Friends of the Israel Museum has funded a variety of projects, including the renewal of the museum's auditorium.

Snyder, who had never visited Israel before his appointment, disclosed that the current Palestinian uprising has cut the flow of foreign visitors by half, but has not interfered with the museum's programming.

"We now exist to serve the needs of a local audience," he explained. "We now concentrate on our core mission: to bring substantial enrichment to our local public."

Despite the intifadah, the Israel Museum functions normally. "You should urge people to visit us," he said. "We're one of the most uplifting institutions in Israel for the enjoyment of art and culture."

Upcoming exhibits include:

- 70 works by sculptor Sir Jacob Epstein, running from July 23 until June 2003;
- 60 paintings and works on paper by Marc Chagall, running from Sept. 10 until Jan. 11, 2003;
- North African Chanukah lamps, mainly from Morocco, running from Aug. 15 until July 2003;
- and the New York photographs of Weegee (Arthur Fellig), running from Dec. 17 until April 2003.

In November 2003, the museum will open its first major exhibition on the civilizations of Turkey.

Jazz duo has Jewish-influenced sound

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

Musical duos are like marriages: the two people must be honest, they must respect individuality and they often riff off each other's harmonies.

Brian Katz and Ernie Tollar have been jamming and jazzing together for over 20 years and like any successful musical marriage, their chemistry is sparking a comfortable friendship and city-wide shows.

Brian Katz (left) and Ernie Tollar of KATZTOLLAR

But before shows come rehearsals in Katz's Christie Street apartment. KATZTOLLAR (as the jazz duo call themselves) pick up instruments and play some excerpts for the me.

With Katz on his classical guitar and Tollar gripping his soprano saxophone, the two flow into a relaxing Middle Eastern tune called The Man From Yemen – based on Katz's travels in Israel.

To show their range, KATZTOLLAR break into a Greek dance rhythm, followed by an Israeli folk song Zemer Atik with Katz on the piano.

"A good rehearsal will cross into jamming," says Katz, smiling and a bit breathless from the 15 minute show. "There's a lot of improvisation but there's similar routines we come back to. We like to make the conventional fresh."

Katz, 45, and Tollar, 38, have a tough time pinning down their music into one genre, but they feel their tunes can be put in the world beat, jazz and Jewish music section of any record store. That kind of diversity makes them a unique attraction at the upcoming Du Maurier Downtown Jazz Festival in Toronto, where they will be performing at St. Clair Avenue's Mezzetta Cafe on June 23 and 25. They also play a show at Harbourfront's du Maurier Theatre on October 11.

Katz is a part-time music teacher at the University of Toronto, and Tollar widely freelances his musical skills (which includes playing the Indian and Arabic flute).

Katz has also performed at the Toronto event Ashkenaz and at the Kristofore International Jewish Festival in Holland. As a composer, Tollar has produced scores for films, such as Shadowmaker – The life of poet Gwendolyn MacEwan.

Understandably, the duo have not had time to record a CD. But Tollar predicts the production will be as comfortable as their relationship.

"It should be no problem," says Tollar, pointing to a stack of music sheets on his sax case. "I've know these songs for a long time." He laughs. "And I know Brian quite well too."

Yet many jazz partnerships are friction-free. What sets KATZTOLLAR apart from other jazz bands is their special stamp of instrumentation coupled with genre range. Modern jazz is rarely played on classical guitar, while the Indian flute carries its own serene delicacy miles away from the North American counterpart.

The duo can move from Afro-Cuban rhythms to Arabic marches to klezmer medleys in one show.

"Lately, I'm more conscious of my investigation of Jewish music, particularly klezmer," says Katz, whose bookshelf has The Essential Klezmer resting beside a Darchei Noam siddur.

"I'm attracted to these sounds and moved by their contours." Katz goes on to explain his love for cantorial music, and how he grew up listening to Yiddish classics. He also spent time teaching at a klezmer camp in Switzerland.

Tollar played with Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band 15 years ago, and has since diversified his musical links, appearing with the Toronto Tabla Ensemble and Daniel Janke's West African jazz group. He has also dabbled in South Indian drumming techniques for the past 10 years.

On the duo's Jewish-inflected sound, Katz feels that the notes pouring through his fingers are touched by his own experiences.

"There's a mix of joy and sadness in Jewish music," he says, "and I totally fit that."

This marriage seems to be riding on a wave of joy recently, and KATZTOLLAR believe the show has only just begun.

"When we're ready to bring ourselves out to the world," Katz says, "we want to have something strong to say. We want to share our roots."

Tickets for du Maurier Downtown Jazz are available at Ticketmaster outlets. Charge by phone at 416-870-8000 or visit www.ticketmaster.ca. Plug into www.torontojazz.com for all of your festival highlights, news and updates.

Jewish ghosts and other fascinations in Central Louisiana

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to the CJN

NATCHITOCHES, La. — Central Louisiana's historic past is as colourful as its people.

In 1700, the French colonized this region near the Spanish controlled boundary. In 1803, the United States bought the land in what is known as the Louisiana Purchase.

Over the years, members of the French and Spanish population had children with their slaves, creating a new population known as "Creole of colour." The "white Creole" – that is, the French – did not want to be associated with their "mixed" half siblings and cousins who carried the same surnames, and stopped referring to themselves as Creole.

This predominantly Catholic region may not be where you would expect Jews to immigrate, but in the 1830s, Jews arrived seeking a new life and were accepted into the community, first as peddlers, then as merchants and professionals.

The Jewish community in the charming town of Natchitoches in Natchitoches Parish (pronounced Nak-a-tush) on the Cane River established a cemetery, a B'nai Brith lodge and a synagogue. Unfortunately, there are no more Jews left in the town today; some left to seek opportunities in larger cities while others passed away without bearing children or assimilated into the general population.

Some of Natchitoches' most beautiful bed and breakfasts were once the homes of prominent Jewish families, including the Levy-East House, which was once owned by the first president of the city's B'nai Brith chapter, Leopold Levy.

The Jewish German Iglehart family built the inn Chez des Amis. Its current owners, Jim Metcalf and Scott Lumry, swear that the ghost of Mrs. Iglehart, who died in the house, still resides in the dwelling. Apparently, during renovations, she slammed doors and fiddled with the electricity when decorating decisions were not to her liking.

According to local folklore, in addition to Mrs. Iglehart, the Jewish ghost, there are a number of other wonderful historic B&Bs – some with spirits and some without. Accommodations steeped in history include Tante Huppé Bed and Breakfast Inn, Maison Louisiane and Judge Porter House.

Natchitoches was immortalized by playwright and hometown boy Robert Harling in Steel Magnolias, which was later turned into a movie. There are plenty of sights to see, including the Kate Chopin House (Chopin is the author of The Awakening) in nearby Cloutierville (pronounced Clucherville).

Plantations are strewn throughout Central Louisiana. In 1994, the Cane River Creole National Historical Park acquired the Oakland and Magnolia Plantations, which is still being renovated. Melrose Plantation dates back to 1796, when former slave Marie Therese Coincoin – who later built a very successful exporting business – and her Creole children were given a piece of land by her French lover Louis Metoyer. Coincoin and Metoyer's descendants, dressed in period costumes, operate tours of the plantation today.

In 1898, Melrose became the home of John and Cammie Garrett Henry. Cammie, a well-known patron of the arts, established an artist residence that nurtured Creole artist Clementine Hunter, who had worked on the Melrose Plantation as a field hand and domestic before she began painting late in her life. To learn more about the Metoyer and other Creole families of the Cane River, visit the St. Augustine Catholic Church and Cemetery and the Creole Heritage Center.

Other historic places in and around Natchitoches include Fort St. Jean Baptiste, a full replica of the 1734 French fort, Old Courthouse State Museum, the American Cemetery and the National Historic Landmark District. Take a ride with Historic District Streetcar Tours, which also rents paddleboats for fun on the river.

The scenic route to Alexandria/ Pineville Parish is through the Kisatchie National Forest, which is famous for Lake Wild Azalea Trail – a great place for outdoor activities.

In the Alexandria area, there is the Kent Plantation House, Central Louisiana's oldest standing structure. Loyd Hall Plantation is a picturesque B&B, but it is a bit crowded, with its 16 cats and four ghosts.

Other places to stay include The Bailey Hotel, newly reopened in Bunke minutes away from the Paragon Casino Resort, both in nearby Avoyelles Parish. A grand place to stay in downtown Alexandria is The Bentley.

Things to do in the vicinity include Southern Forest Heritage Museum in Long Leaf, Louisiana Maneuvers and Military Museum located on Camp Beauregard, River Oaks Square Arts Center, Alexandria Zoological Park, the "A Shoppes" – 10 unique boutiques – and The Nest, a hiking area with its own spa.

The Alexandria Museum of Art, is now preparing for The Heart of Spain in September 2003, consisting of art treasures that have never before left the Iberian peninsula.

For more information, contact the Natchitoches Convention and Visitors Bureau at 1-800-259-1714, the Alexandria Pineville Area Convention and Visitors Bureau at 1-800-551-9546 and the Avoyelles Commission of Tourism at 1-800-833-4195.

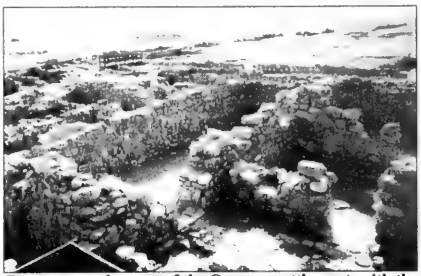
Ancient Jewish culture preserved in the caves of Qumran

Fifty-five years after a Bedouin shepherd went in search of a lost goat and found seven ancient scrolls in a cave at Qumran, we know surprisingly little about the Jewish sect that produced the roughly 850 scrolls that were eventually found in 11 caves above the northwestern shore of the Dead Sea between 1947 and 1956.

The Dead Sea Scrolls are regarded as a major scientific discovery of the last century, just as their suppression for decades by a secretive clique of Christian scholars ranks as one of the century's biggest academic scandals.

But all that is history, now that almost all of the scrolls have found their way into print. These crumbling parchments have been of immense importance to our understanding of Second Temple-era Judaism and the immediate pre-Christian era.



Reconstructed rooms of the Qumran settlement, with the scriptorium in the centre. Scribes supposedly produced the scrolls in this room. [Bill Gladstone photo]

The consensus among biblical scholars is that it was the Essenes, a Judaic religious sect of extreme piety and asceticism, who produced the scrolls, keeping a library of some 550 of them in Cave 4, and stashing hundreds of others in various caves when the Romans attacked their isolated camp in 68 CE.

However, New York University Prof. Lawrence Schiffman offers a thoughtful hypothesis that it was the Sadducees, loyalists of the First Temple priesthood, who established the large monastic settlement on these heights above the Dead Sea, the excavated ruins of which tourists may inspect today.

Qumran's mystery sect set up camp about 150 BCE, archeologists claim, which is only a year or so after the First Temple-era priestly family lost control of the holy franchise.

An audiovisual presentation in the new visitor centre at Qumran paints a picture of strict religious devotion by a community consisting entirely of celibate males.

"Think of a Catholic monastic order with a strict rule. Then you've got some concept of daily life here," said our guide, Mike Rogoff, during a recent tour. "Vows of purity, chastity and poverty – all of these applied."

But archeologists are puzzled by the fact that some women and children were also apparently buried in the communal cemetery.

Many of the rules that guided the Qumran community were laid out in the Manual of Discipline, one of many scrolls composed by sect members. Another, the War Scroll, challenges the consensus opinion that the sect was pacifist in nature. Essentially a combat manual, the War Scroll describes an apocryphal battle between the Children of Light (the Qumran sect) and an unidentified metaphorical enemy called the Children of Darkness. Obviously, the Qumran sect were millennialists.

"They saw themselves as the Sons of Light; it was the forces of good fighting against the forces of evil," Rogoff said. "There was supposed to be seven battles fought – I always think of this as an eschatological world series. Three would be won by the Sons of Light and three by the Sons of Bad. And then the Sons of Good would win in the end. The scroll is a game plan for an end-of-the-world battle."

We strolled through the rebuilt foundations of an aqueduct, reservoirs, cisterns, observation tower, kitchen, pantry, dining hall, mikvah, pottery workshop and the rectangular scriptorium.

"This is where they actually wrote the Dead Sea Scrolls," Rogoff explained. "They found ink-pots, one of bronze and one of clay, and a sort of desk." (Visitors may also hike along mountain trails and explore some of the many caves in the area.)

Very roughly speaking, about one-third of the 850 scrolls are biblical texts, representing every book of the Hebrew Bible except Esther. Another third are post-biblical and apocryphal works composed by outsiders to the Qumran sect, like the famous Temple Scroll. The last third are mostly works composed by sect members.

They were written on leather, papyrus and – in the case of the Copper Scroll – copper. Many, including the War Scroll and the celebrated Isaiah Scroll, are on view in the Shrine of the Book at the Israel Museum, which affords them the reverential treatment they deserve.

As 19th-century geographer George Adam Smith observes, the biblical-era history of the Dead Sea area may be said to begin with Sodom and Gomorrah, and to end with the massacre at Masada. The barren desert landscape around this legendary, low-lying lake also evokes images of the Ein Gedi oasis and Ezekiel's vision.

Ever since 1947 – at the time of the founding of the modern Jewish state – we also associate the region with the extraordinary discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls and the many aspects of Jewish history and writings that they illuminate so richly.

The writer travelled to Israel courtesy of the Israel Government Tourist Office and El Al Israel Airlines. Israeli tour guide Mike Rogoff can be reached by email at rogoff@netvision.net.il.

Israelis take part in breast cancer conference

All delegates survived the disease

BY LAUREN KRAMER
Pacific Correspondent

VICTORIA — The World Conference on Breast Cancer which took place recently in Victoria drew together breast cancer survivors from such places as Cameroon, Egypt, Israel, Lebanon, Zambia and Yugoslavia.

Delegates to the conference, which was organized and funded by the Ontario chapter of the Canadian Breast Cancer Foundation, are all survivors of breast cancer, are instrumental in organizing support groups in their own country, and participate in the International Support Links Program.

Israeli delegate Nurit Tolnai said that after her mastectomy in 1992, it struck her that there were women out there who needed help in coping with the disease.

She was distressed by the attitude she encountered among the medical specialists who treated her, she said. "Doctors saw [only] my sick breast, not me as a whole person."

Tolnai decided to take action, and in 1994, she started up an organization called One in Nine: Women for Women with Breast Cancer.

Nurit Tolnai of Tel Aviv (left) is welcomed to the World Conference on Breast Cancer in Victoria by Marjie Cohn, of Canadian Breast Cancer Foundation (CBCF), Ontario chapter.

The name refers to the number of women around the world who are expected to be diagnosed with breast cancer.

One in Nine now maintains a Web site in Hebrew and English (www.onein9.org.il) which contains information and a forum of 14 doctors who provide counsel to visitors to the site.

There is also a hotline manned by volunteers who are breast cancer survivors, and a quarterly newsletter circulated to the over 1,000 members.

Tolnai, who works 12-hour days on this project, says that since its inception, the organization has assisted close to 2,000 women.

She plans to deliver workshops to women in the workplace in order to talk about the problems encountered by those with breast cancer.

In Canada, it is estimated that of the more than 19,000 cases diagnosed each year, 5,500 people will die from it. In North America, breast cancer is the leading killer of women ages 35 to 55.

Marjie Cohn, director of communications for the Ontario chapter of the Canadian Breast Cancer Foundation, said that bringing the delegates together was part of an effort to raise awareness of breast cancer on a global level.

"Partnerships and collaboration are so important," she said. "It's just wonderful seeing these women energized by each other."

Group home has vacancies

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

While other Jewish social service agencies struggle with long waiting lists, there are three spots open at a group home operated by the Chai-Tikvah Foundation for people with mental health disorders.

Located on Stonedene Boulevard in the Bathurst-Steeles area, the residence is designed to house eight people with a variety of mental health issues, including schizophrenia, bipolar disorder, anorexia and Tourette's syndrome. It's fully kosher, and Jewish holidays are observed. There's round-the-clock supervision.

Rochelle Goldman-Brown, Chai-Tikvah's longtime executive-director, says the main reason the home has vacancies is because its 75-name waiting list became out of date and has been dropped.

Goldman-Brown says those who had been on the list have found other accommodations or services, at least partly because the average length of stay in the residence is eight to nine years.

Residents, aged 30 to 50, have access to a variety of services, and must be out of the residence for at least four hours a day. They cook their own meals, do laundry and run errands. No one has a history of violence.

The home has had 58 clients in its history.

Founded in 1983 under the umbrella of Reena, which works to integrate the developmentally disabled into mainstream society, the Chai-Tikvah Foundation seeks to make life easier for those with mental health disorders.

It was established by a group of parents whose adult children had nowhere to turn in the community for support and services. As with Reena, a prime mover behind the group was Rabbi Joseph Kelman, who has made a point of noting that even King Saul suffered from depression and a mental breakdown.

Chai-Tikvah separated from Reena in 1987. It works closely with Jewish Family & Child Service, from which it often receives referrals.

The organization gets 100 per cent of its funding from Ontario's health ministry. Several requests for funds to the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto have been turned down, Goldman-Brown says.

Chai-Tikvah also offers home visits and crisis support to those who live on their own or with relatives, and runs "Club Simcha," whose members meet at the home to give them a chance to socialize.

On June 27, Chai-Tikvah is slated to host a presentation on supportive housing by representatives of several community mental health agencies in Toronto. It will take place at the Bernard Betel Centre, 1003 Steeles Ave. W. at 7:00 pm.

Maccabi youth team seeks hoopsters

Maccabi basketball coaches are looking for good young players to fill out the youth team that will represent Canada at the 10th Pan Am Maccabi Games, to be held July 17-28, 2003 in Caracas, Venezuela.

Toronto-based tryouts for the team will be held on Tuesday June 25 and Thursday June 27 at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, 4588 Bathurst St., from 7:30 p.m. to 10 p.m.

Boys born between Jan. 1, 1984 and Dec. 31, 1986 and who reside in Canada are eligible.

A $35 administrative fee is being required of everyone trying out for the team. Those who make the team will be asked to pay the full cost of the trip – a total of $3,500 per player, said assistant coach Irv Mintz.

Unlike athletes who compete in the Maccabiah Games, which are held in Israel, Pan Am athletes are not subsidized, he added.

The Pan Am Maccabi Games are held every four years and include teams from Canada, the United States, Latin America as well as Israel.

For more information, contact head coach Ted Badner at 905-707-7556.

Athletes gear up for youth games

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

There was a time when sporting activities were dominated by boys: boys basketball, boys soccer, boys baseball, boys... fill in the blank.

Those days are long gone as girls have taken to sports in a way their mothers could hardly have imagined.

Female athletes will play a prominent role in the Toronto team at the JCC Maccabi Games, which will be held in Montreal from Aug. 18-23.

Toronto's Maccabi contingent will include a girls basketball team, a girls soccer team, a girls softball squad as well as female swimmers and tennis players.

Toronto's Maccabi team will also include boys teams in basketball and soccer, a baseball team and an all-male golf team, as well as male representation on the swimming and tennis teams.

Altogether, 90 athletes aged 13-16 will represent Toronto at the summer games. The city could have fielded an even larger squad, but event organizers limited the size of participating teams to keep the overall number of athletes to 1,300, said Grant Smith, head of the Toronto delegation.

The JCC Maccabi will also include teams from a variety of North American cities as well as Britain, Australia, Mexico, Venezuela and Israel.

Four other cities – Baltimore, Memphis, Omaha and Springfield, Mass. – will host parallel games.

Montreal is the second Canadian city to host a youth games. Toronto was the first in 1986.

Last year's Toronto team returned home with 50 medals and were particularly successful in swimming events. The boys soccer team won a bronze as did the girls softball team. The girls hoops squad finished second.

Smith expects the swimmers to again be very competitive along with the girls basketball team, which had won gold medals four years in a row prior to last summer's silver.

Smith said special efforts have been made to include a larger number of female athletes. "We want to give girls the support to compete at a high level and make it a 50-50 split. But there will always be more boys than girls," he said.

Maccabi organizers find that in the summer, female athletes are more likely to attend sleepover camps while a lot more boys remain in town and play rep sports, like baseball and soccer.

Only 15 girls showed up for the softball tryout compared to 30-40 boys. Soccer proved more popular among girls, attracting 20-25 girls, Smith said.

In addition to sporting competition, athletes at the Montreal games will be treated to Judaic cultural activities as well as an outing to a "Canada's Wonderland"-type facility, Smith said.

Moroccan Jews bring colour to Toronto

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

During the late '50s, '60s and '70s, in the predominantly eastern European Toronto Jewish community, the Goldsteins, Rosenbergs and Rubensteins woke up to the arrival of the Pintos, Mamanns and Sottos – Moroccan Jewry. This new immigration would forever change the face of Jewish Toronto.

Moroccan Jews, who are Sephardim (Hebrew for Spain, from which most Moroccan Jews were expelled), arrived here with little, other than a culture and approach to Judaism overflowing with richness and character. Fleeing anti-Semitism doesn't allow for much packing.

Some 5,000 Moroccan Jews would ultimately make Toronto their home. In four short decades of overcoming great challenges, Moroccan Jews developed an incredible religious and communal infrastructure, boasting more than half a dozen French and Spanish speaking synagogues including the Sephardic Kehilla Centre, Magen David, Minyan Sepharad, Petach Tikvah and Tiferet Israel. Their chief rabbi is Rabbi Amram Assayag. There is a Sephardi day school called Or Ha'emet, whose curriculum includes hugs and affirmations.

Attend a Moroccan synagogue one Shabbat. You'll discover the service is mostly said aloud as opposed to Ashkenazi prayers, which are predominantly silent. I was amazed to learn that my friend, Bert Serfaty, like most Moroccan Jews, knew the morning and Musaf prayer by heart, sang it passionately and with great pleasure.

Toronto's Jewish Moroccans have also been able to maintain their unique minhaggim (traditions), including the Henna ceremony. This traditional ceremony is performed for the bride prior to the wedding ceremony. The bride in dressed in a magnificently majestic dress (bestido), and the guests sing ancient songs and have their palms annointed with a muddy smear called the "Henna." If you only attend one Jewish simchah this year, make it a Henna.

Moroccan Jews actively pursued a solid Jewish education for their children. Their respect and reverence for learning and wise people were deeply imbedded through a legacy of scholarship left over from the brilliance of Rabbi Moshe ben Maimon (Rambam) and Rav Yosef Caro – both of whom lived in Morocco and are revered by all Jews for their redaction of Jewish law.

However, at the time of the Moroccan immigration, Toronto Jewry was reeling from post-Holocaust revelations, and harboured a sociological discomfort with Jews of such a divergent culture. A number of Jewish day schools refused to enrol Moroccan children. Those that did were ill equipped to integrate the newcomers properly, creating a non-graded class for children of every age.

Assistance was forthcoming from the Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS) and Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS).

Maurice Benzacar was one of those who was helped. Eventually Maurice was himself hired by JIAS and helped other Jewish immigrants from Morocco, Russia, Yugoslavia, Romania and Ethiopia.

Prior to the arrival of Moroccan Jews, Toronto shul-hoppers were only exposed to Shabbat kiddush menus composed of heavy dishes like cholent, with a non-descript dessert of kichlach, all washed down with a shot of scotch. This changed however, with the advent of Moroccan shuls, and their kiddushes, consisting of tasty Moroccan delicacies prepared with culinary artistry. A Shabbat kiddush table in a Moroccan shul is set with Dafina, a sort of Moroccan cholent, and couscous, a small grain, steamed and served with cinnamon and sugar, along with cooked dried fruits such as raisins, dates and prunes. Our Jewish palate has been shaken!

There are still things to be ironed out within the Moroccan Jewish community, such as the development of further youth programs. Change is inevitable. Toronto Jewry, however, has not been the same since we woke up to their arrival and our community is now infinitely richer and certainly more colourful. In the words of the Sephardi sages - Chazak Uvaruch. Strength and blessings. Well done!

About Life

Dear Ella,

My son Jason has just come back from university. When he first came home, it was a pleasure to see him. We missed him.

Living away this year has really changed him – mostly for the better. But not with regard to his opinions on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Jason is trying to see both sides "fairly" as he would put it, but he is misinformed about many of the issues and when we try to enlighten him on the history and facts, he argues even more and it always ends up badly. My mother is a Holocaust survivor and lives with us as well. She is so upset by Jason's attitude, I am actually afraid for her health. I know we taught Jason to think for himself, but this is not what we had in mind. What should we do?

Too Much Conflict

Dear Too Much Conflict,

There is nothing wrong with your son thinking for himself – in fact, you are to be commended for teaching him to have his own ideas. It is to be expected that he will not always agree with your opinions. Religion and politics are usually the hardest subjects to debate, and unfortunately, both play a role in these issues and both are near and dear to your heart.

But you have to try to discuss the issues with him calmly or, as you said, it will always end up badly. You must keep yourself in check to get your message across or he will never understand the history and facts as you know them. Remember, though, that even after you talk, you might not change his opinion.

As for your mother, both you and Jason have to understand that this is a very emotional and controversial subject and should not be discussed in front of her if you are concerned about her health. However, keep in mind that being a Holocaust survivor, she has the experiences to teach him a very important history lesson.

Even if you don't agree with Jason, be proud that he is intelligent enough to have formed his own opinions and comfortable enough to present them to you.

Teacher mourns for a fallen student

By RIVKA BEJELL
Special to The CJN

The phone call came from my school. It wasn't official yet, but rumour had it that our former student Shani Avi-Zedek, 15, was on the 32 bus that had just been bombed, on her way to a yom keff (a day in the swimming pool) with her new school.

Shani was my student for three years, all through junior high, a bright, pretty, vivacious, friendly girl, always involved in school activities. She was on the school paper committee and on the va'ad kitah (class council), she participated in all the parties and fun activities, and was also a straight-A student. She had the knack of making friends wherever she went, and she stayed loyal to old friends while she was busy making new contacts in her new school.

After having an hour-long discussion with her best friend Mor the previous night, Shani phoned another friend, Yael, and made plans to meet her on the 7:45 bus to town the following morning. Yael, fortunately, ran late and missed the bus. Shani was on time, as usual.

Friends of Shani Avi-Zedek are seen mourning at her funeral. She was one of 19 people killed by a suicide bomber in Gilo last week. By the end of the week, 32 Israelis had been killed. Inset, Avi-Zedek.
[Israpet photo]

After the bomb went off, Shani's family went frantically looking for her. With the help of friends and neighbours, they searched every single hospital in Jerusalem. They knew for sure that she was on that bus (she had called Yael, minutes before the explosion, to ask her why she wasn't on the bus).

Jewish Memorials

WINKLER, Man. — A plaque and park were dedicated here recently paying tribute to Jews who settled in this town about 120 kilometres southwest of Winnipeg. The memorial to Jewish pioneers and the Jewish Settlers' Heritage Park pay homage to the heads of the 15 Jewish families that settled in Winkler before World War I, as well as their children.

ISRAEL

Arafat's Theft?

JERUSALEM — Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat has pocketed more than $5 million (US) in foreign aid intended for needy Palestinians, according to a Kuwaiti newspaper. Al-Watan also claimed that Arafat diverted aid money from Arab states that was earmarked for Palestinians who lost homes during Israel's anti-terror operation in the West Bank this spring.

Mad Cow Disease

JERUSALEM — The Israeli cabinet has approved more than $3 million (US) to fight an outbreak of mad cow disease. The government took the move after an outbreak of the disease was found earlier this month at a farm in the Golan Heights.

Bomb Bets Probed

JERUSALEM — Israeli police are investigating reports that an illegal gambling ring in the country is taking bets on where the next Palestinian suicide bomber will strike. The ring, which operates in the town of Kiryat Malachi, is distributing betting sheets with the odds for various locations, according to the reports.

WORLD

NA Aliyah Up

NEW YORK — For the first time in years, North American aliyah is on its way up. According to the Jewish Agency for Israel, the number of North Americans making aliyah in 2002 will reach 1,500, an increase of 20 per cent over last year.

Turner Says Sorry

ATLANTA — Ted Turner has apologized for saying both Israel and the Palestinians are engaged in terrorism. "I want to make it absolutely clear that my view was – and is – that there is a fundamental distinction between the acts of the Israeli government and the Palestinians," the founder of Cable News Network (CNN) said last week. "I believe the Israeli government has used excessive force to defend itself, but that is not the same as intentionally targeting and killing civilians with suicide bombers." In earlier comments, Turner was quoted as saying that "both sides are involved in terrorism."

Medal to Arafat

RIO DE JANEIRO — Rio's city council has awarded its highest honour to Yasser Arafat. The move reversed a recent close vote not to award the Pedro Ernesto Medal to the Palestinian Authority chairman. Gerson Bergher, a leader of the city's 40,000 Jews and a former council president, said the reversal took place while he was absent from his municipal duties.

Rabbi Backs Down

NEW YORK — A militant rabbi has decided not to launch armed patrols of Jewish sections of Brooklyn, despite an "overwhelmingly" positive response. Rabbi Yakove Lloyd vowed, however, to put the patrols on the streets soon, despite police threats that they would be arrested.

Embassy Move

WASHINGTON — U.S. President George W. Bush has postponed moving the U.S. embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem for an additional six months. The Jerusalem Embassy Act of 1995 requires the United States to move its embassy to Jerusalem, but the two presidents since then have made use of a waiver enabling them to postpone the move for national security reasons. Bush said in a memo that his administration "remains committed to beginning the process of moving our embassy to Jerusalem."

Jews Sue

NEW YORK — Jews who once lived in Arab nations are planning to sue the Arab League for lost and stolen property. Some 800,000 Jews fled Arab lands after Israel was created. The action was the idea of Amram Attias, a Moroccan-born Jew who lives in New York. The lawsuit does not estimate a financial figure, but is seeking restitution for 200,000 houses, 6,000 synagogues, and hundreds of schools, cemeteries and other assets confiscated from once-thriving Jewish communities across the Arab world.

Charles on Tour

KRAKOW — Prince Charles toured Jewish sites here earlier this month. Wearing an embroidered blue kippah, Charles toured Krakow's centuries-old Remuh synagogue and Old Jewish Cemetery.

Rhodes Exhibit

ATHENS — The archeological museum on the Greek island of Rhodes is mounting an exhibit about the once-thriving local Jewish community. The exhibit, running until July 15, focuses on the history and daily lives of Jews who once lived on Rhodes. The Nazis occupied Rhodes in 1943 and deported all of the island's 1,700 Jews to Auschwitz; only 161 survived. There are now fewer than 50 Jews remaining.

Chrétien Condemns Terror Bombings

OTTAWA — Prime Minister Jean Chrétien last week issued the following statement expressing the "shock and outrage" of Canadians after back-to-back terrorist attacks in Jerusalem killed 25 Israelis, including many young people:

"Canadians are horrified by these brutal attacks. They seek not only to destroy innocent lives, but are clearly aimed at derailing all efforts to achieve a lasting resolution to the conflict. They must not be allowed to succeed. G-8 leaders will review the prospects for peace in the region [this] week [at the G-8 summit] in Kananaskis during our discussions of international issues.

"Canada strongly condemns these terrorist attacks and urges all who truly seek peace to call an end to them. No cause can justify these terrible acts and no resolution can

Grass-roots group marches against anti-Semitism

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Marchers bearing Canadian, American and Israeli flags held signs denouncing hatred and supporting democracy during Sunday's Canadian March for Humanity and a subsequent rally in Queen's Park.

The event, attended by an estimated 600 people, was organized by a new grassroots group, Canadians Against Antisemitism, spearheaded by Sandra Stern.

Following the 15-minute walk to the site of the Ontario government, formalities included addresses from a dozen speakers, including politicians and Jewish, Christian and Sikh clergy.

Stern said she hoped to take the event across Canada in the near future. "People can change the world. They can make a difference," she said.

Our peaceful society "must remain a beacon," said Art Eggleton, Liberal MP for York Centre and Canada's former defence minister. Canada must stand with the people of Israel in the fight against terrorism, he said.

Liberal senator Jerry Grafstein noted that anti-Semitism "starts with Jews, but it never ends with Jews."

On behalf of the New Democratic Party, Winnipeg Centre MP Pat Martin denounced "in the strongest possible terms the disturbing rise of anti-Semitic incidents" both here and abroad. He attributed the rise in anti-Semitism, at least in part, to the portrayal of Israel in the media.

Sgt. Johnnie Stevens, a black veteran of one of the first U.S. army battalions to liberate the concentration camps, said it was because of people such as those at the rally that the United States had changed its discriminatory ways.

Max Eisen, who was liberated by Stevens' all-black battalion, said he was greatly heartened to see people of different faiths at the event.

30 years of women rabbis celebrated

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

When Rabbi Sally Priesand was ordained as a rabbi in 1972, she changed women's place in Judaism permanently.

Rabbi Priesand was the first woman rabbi ordained from Hebrew Union College – Jewish Institute of Religion (HUC/JIR) in Cincinnati, and the first woman rabbi to be ordained from any denomination.

She was in Toronto recently to help celebrate 30 years of women rabbis at an event jointly sponsored by Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning; Na'amat; National Council of Jewish Women; UJA Federation Women's Campaign & Advocacy; Jewish Women International of Canada; Canadian Women for Reform Judaism; Women's League for Conservative Judaism/Canadian Seaway Branch; and Jewish Reconstructionist Federation.

Also on the panel – marking the first time they have spoken together publicly – were Rabbi Sandy Eisenberg Sasso, the first woman ordained as a Reconstructionist rabbi, and Rabbi Amy Eilberg, the first woman ordained as a Conservative rabbi.

The evening also included a tribute to the GTA's female rabbis: Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, rabbinic director of Kolel; Rabbi Debra Landsberg, spiritual leader, Temple Emanu-El; Rabbi Lori Macklis, assistant rabbi, Temple Sinai; Rabbi Michal Shekel, assistant rabbi, Temple Har Zion; Rabbi Sharon Sobel, director, Canadian Council for Reform Judaism; and Rabbi Yael Splansky, associate rabbi, Holy Blossom Temple.

Rabbi Goldstein told the capacity crowd at Holy Blossom Temple that the three women on the panel "rise above stereotypes and narrow definitions to bring to the rabbinate a wholeness it now can be proud of."

The celebration, she said, focused on what is unique about being both female and a rabbi, and what has changed in the past 30 years.

Rabbi Priesand, who has served as rabbi of Monmouth Reform Temple in New Jersey since 1981, said that she decided she wanted to be a rabbi at age 16, but did not think about being a pioneer or about championing women's rights. "I just wanted to be a rabbi.

"I am grateful, [though] that part of my life's work has been to open new doors to women in the Jewish community. My rabbinate has been based on the concept of empowerment...

"Rabbis are not surrogate Jews whose power is absolute, but facilitators and teachers who help others discover the richness of our heritage. In this realm, Jewish feminism has encouraged us to rethink previous models of leadership in which the rabbi maintained complete control and did everything for members," she said.

"Over the past three decades synagogues have moved more and more away from the concept of hierarchy and power toward new opportunities for partnership and networking."

An evening celebrating the 30th anniversary of women as rabbis featured, from left, Rabbi Sally Priesand, first woman Reform rabbi and first woman rabbi from any denomination; Rabbi Sandy Eisenberg Sasso, first woman Reconstructionist rabbi; Rabbi Amy Eilberg, first woman Conservative rabbi; and Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, rabbinic director, Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning. [Carolyn Blackman photo]

In many ways, Rabbi Priesand said, Jewish feminism has been a grassroots movement, but change at the top has taken longer. "But even there, tokenism is becoming a thing of the past."

Over the past two years, more than a dozen women have joined the faculty at HUC/JIR, more women have become regional directors and vice-chairs of the Reform movement's Union of American Hebrew Congregations, and the Central Conference of American Rabbis is set to install its first female president.

"This bodes well for our daughters and for our people," Rabbi Priesand said.

Rabbi Sasso, who was ordained by the Reconstructionist Rabbinical College in 1974, serves with her husband Rabbi Dennis Sasso at Congregation Beth El Tzedec in Indianapolis as part of the first practising rabbinic couple in the world.

While at rabbinical school, Rabbi Sasso said, she discovered her goal "was not to fit in, but to bring who I was to the rabbinate. My being a woman was not the only point, but neither was it besides the point."

For 30 years, said Rabbi Sasso, who is also the author of spiritual children's books, women rabbis have brought the pain and healing in their lives to their roles "and in the process have renewed the Jewish community.

"Women's spirituality [is marked] with a belief that difference does not mean inferiority or superiority. Women construct a network, not a hierarchy. They bring together diverse voices and build consensus."

Rabbi Eilberg, a pastoral counsellor, is co-founder of the Bay Area Jewish Healing Centre and a nationally recognized leader in the field of Judaism and healing. She was ordained 17 years ago by the Jewish Theological Seminary of America.

She said the ordination of women was the only way for the Conservative movement to be true to its own "raison d'etre – offering Jews a way to live a traditional Jewish life in the concept of change, contemporary reality and ethical sensibilities.

"Only by embracing the equality of all its members could the Conservative movement be true to its own ideals," she said.

Women rabbis have done what all rabbis have done, "but in this pioneering generation we have made contributions that are uniquely ours as women, and we are proud.

"We have wrestled with new questions and found new responses that are unique to women's realities. We have created ways to respond with prayer, to the sacred but hitherto unacknowledged moments in women's life cycles.

"We serve with open doors, those who feel that Judaism had been closed to them, because we too had been excluded," she said.

Tories' tax cut delay leaves parents 'very upset'

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Disappointment – mixed with fear the measure might be permanent – greeted the Ontario government's announcement last week that it is putting the tax credit for private school education on hold for one year.

While expressing understanding that Queen's Park must trim spending and raise revenue, Jewish officials voiced dismay that Premier Ernie Eves was freezing the popular Equity in Education tax credit, a measure the Jewish community had fought hard for.

In the provincial budget brought down June 17, finance minister Janet Ecker announced the Tories would delay the second phase of the credit, meaning it will be frozen for a year at $700, or 10 per cent of the first $7,000 in private school tuition fees.

The move is expected to save the province roughly $15 million.

The credit, introduced a year ago, had been slated to rise to $1,400, or 20 per cent of tax-deductible fees next year, and increased annually until it reached the maximum of $3,500, or 50 per cent of fees, by 2006. It was expected to cost some $300 million once fully in place.

"It's a real disappointment," said Seymour Epstein, executive director of UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education. "On the other hand, we understand fiscal pressure. We're prepared to wait and have patience, as long as it's for one year. It's understandable, but it's still a disappointment."

Georgeanne Burke, a spokesperson for Jewish Parents for Equality in Education Funding (JPEEF), and one of the leaders in the fight for funding of private, faith-based schools, was forthright: "We are very disappointed. This will represent a tiny amount of saving, just .07 per cent of the budget. It singles out parents [of children] in religious schools who have been discriminated against."

Though small, the saving "will have a major impact on religious parents."

Burke said "a lot of Jewish parents are very upset. They're nervous and worried, and justifiably so." Some parents, she said, are worrying that the tax credit will never be fully implemented.

Some newspaper columnists went further, speculating that the credit was as good as dead.

But Ecker, a former education minister who once opposed the credit, assured reporters that the delay is "simply a one-year postponement" in the life of the credit.

"We are very disappointed," stated Yisroel Janowski, president of the Ontario Association of Jewish Day Schools (OAJDS). "We took [the Tories'] promise for what we felt it was.

"We hope the entire program will be re-instituted."

Meantime, Janowski is urging Jewish parents and other interested parties to "let the government know what our concerns are."

While also expressing disappointment with the delay, the Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress said the Jewish community "fully appreciates the general fiscal pressures that has influenced the government to take these measures.

"We have waited a long time in order to achieve some equity for our children in independent religious schools. [The] announcement calls for patience as opposed to a political re-assessment. We fully expect that this one time measure will in no way affect the tax credit in the long term. The government has indicated to us time and again its full support of this measure," CJC region chair Ed Morgan said in a statement.

Morgan said the credit "must be seen as part of an attempt to rectify a longstanding human rights inequity. As such, it is not equivalent to other tax initiatives."

On other budget matters, CJC said it was gratified to note that the province's freeze on home care health funding was removed.

The Jewish community had lobbied for the removal of the freeze.

However, CJC said it appears funding for home care is still inadequate, and that it would continue to press for more.

Russian community launches campaign for Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Toronto's Russian Jewish community has undertaken an emergency campaign to raise $100,000 for the victims of terror in Israel.

The campaign – the first of its kind in the Russian community – is already well under way, with 40 to 45 per cent of its target already reached. UJA Federation will match the amount raised through its Challenge Fund, meaning $200,000 or more could be headed to Israel in the next few months.

Prior to the launch of the campaign in early May, the Russian Jewish community in Toronto had focused on raising money to support local programs and schools, said Inna Kholodenko, who co-chairs the campaign along with Rita Khazanski.

But with reports from Israel describing the carnage being inflicted on the Jewish community there – many of whom are immigrants from the Former Soviet Union (FSU) – an initiative was launched to appeal for support from the local Russian community, Kholodenko said.

Approximately one million Jews from the FSU live in Israel and many local Jews have friends and family living with the threat of terrorism.

"Everybody was watching the news, what was going on. It was extremely frustrating. We were getting upset by the situation and feeling we should do something about it," Kholodenko, a native of Ukraine, said.

The emergency campaign is being held in parallel to the Russian community's annual fund-raising effort, which this year has a target of $2.4 million, up from $2.04 million the year before, said Rabbi Yoseph Zaltzman, senior rabbi of the Jewish Russian Community's Centre (JRCC).

Speaking at a luncheon headlined by Rabbi Berel Lazar, chief rabbi of Russia, Rabbi Zaltzman described the remarkable growth of the community in the last 20 years. In 1981, Toronto was home to 1,500 Russian families. Today there are 8,000 families and a total of about 40,000 Russian Jews.

In the last 20 years, the community has opened a day school and weekend schools, and it offers adult education classes. Four full-time synagogues serve the community. During the most recent High Holy Days, services were held in seven synagogues and that figure is expected to rise to eight during the High Holy Days later this year. The community also supports a monthly Russian newspaper, and a new English-language monthly magazine is set to debut in July.

The Russian community raises the vast majority of the JRCC's operating budget, with this year's total budget set at $4 million, Rabbi Zaltzman said.

Russian Jews are very supportive of Israel and a good number of them lived in Israel before moving to Toronto, he said.

The funds raised by the community "will help victims of terror," Rabbi Zaltzman added, though he said the precise target programs are not set yet.

Demand accountability

Last week, 32 Israelis were killed by brutal acts of deliberate slaughter by Palestinian murderers aimed primarily at defenceless individuals, mostly women and children. In response, the government of Israel decided to send its Defence Forces into the West Bank, once again, to find and destroy the terrorist infrastructure. As long as the Palestinian Authority (PA) refuses to destroy – they already know where to find – the terrorist infrastructure, Israel has no serious alternative but to try.

It was a weighty decision made reluctantly, with a heavy but resolute heart. It will undoubtedly mean more bloodshed on both sides. Indeed, the IDF apologized on Saturday for the mistaken deaths of three innocent Palestinians, two of whom were children.

Israel's Minister of Defence Benjamin Ben-Eliezer emphasized that the IDF operation is military only and strictly temporary. "There is no intention and there won't be...any control of civil affairs...in the Palestinian areas in which the army is fighting terror," Ben-Eliezer said.

A government's – any government's – first and highest obligation is to defend its citizens. Israel must and will do that. No decent, responsible, moral country anywhere on earth would have decided differently than Israel has in these circumstances.

The military presence, checkpoints, roadblocks, inspections, incursions and myriad other interventions by the IDF into Palestinian life are indeed humiliating to the Palestinians, as PA spokespeople maintain. No one, certainly not the Israelis, denies that. But humiliation can never justify the deliberate, terrorizing and terrifying slaughter of innocent life. Moreover, and equally to the point, Palestinian humiliation is the result of the deceitful behaviour of PA Chairman Yasser Arafat. It was he who decided to walk away from the negotiations table, reject compromise, unleash violence against Israelis, refute every commitment he made to forever abjure violence, glorify "shaheedism" (suicide bomber martyrdom), incite terror against Israelis, fund terrorism against Israelis, collaborate with terror organizations and with nation-state-exporters of terror against Israelis and Jews, and even send out young murderers to perpetrate their unique form of violence against Israelis.

Before September 2000, the PA ruled over more than 90 per cent of the Palestinian people in the West Bank and Gaza, if not yet over more than 90 per cent of the territory there. The Palestinian economy was soaring. Unemployment was very low. Many economic and industrial programs were under way jointly with Israel and Jordan and many more were planned. Many military, agricultural, educational and social programs were also under way or planned jointly with Israel. Investment from overseas poured into the PA. Tourism flourished in the West Bank and east of it. The Jericho casino alone was bringing $40 million (US) each month into PA coffers. Because of Arafat, it has all come to an end.

It is high time and high honesty that the Palestinian people and western leaders finally demand accountability from Arafat rather than make excuses and apologies for him. By wielding the gun and the suicide bomber's backpack and belt, it is he who has brought his people to this sorry condition of humiliation and much worse.

Thanks, CUPE, for singling out Israel

Bravo to Ontario CUPE for bravely standing up to the Israeli military machine! Clearly, CUPE head Syd Ryan and others gave great thought to their resolution and recognized the necessity of singling out for condemnation one of the few countries in the world to possess the necessary mechanisms of democracy and due process that allow for and value dissent and legitimate criticism. Obviously, they were aware that a resolution critical of Israel was least likely to fall upon deaf ears. How else to explain the lack of any similar resolutions condemning Russia's systematic destruction of Chechnya, China's role in fomenting Maoist insurrection in Nepal, Syria's state-controlled tyranny of its own population and its military, financial and political support of the terrorist organization Hezbollah, Pakistan's support of Islamic militant extremists in Kashmir and, of course, Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat and Fatah's logistical, financial and moral support of homicide bombers? I salute Ryan and his supporters for their single-minded determination and intelligence.

Women's bravery in Auschwitz

Regarding Bernard Baskin's column "Another valuable collection" about the book Never Far Away: The Auschwitz Chronicles of Anna Heilman (CJN, May 30), I have just completed the translation from Hebrew and Yiddish of a Yizkor book on Ciechanow for the Jewish Geneological Society. It contains seven pages devoted to the same struggle in Auschwitz that was carried out with the courageous help of the women who worked in the ammunition factory in Auschwitz's forced labour camp.

In those pages, Rosa Robota is recalled as a heroine because she was instrumental in organizing the women's participation and accepted a torturous death rather than reveal the names of the others who took part. Heilman would probably recognize this name.

No Muslim moral dilemma?

In an article May 31 in the Toronto Star, Tawria Hamamra describes herself as a devout Muslim who volunteered to carry out an attack on behalf of the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade. Her purpose, as of those before her, was to murder innocent men, women and children. She only balked when told by her handlers that she had to dress like a modern Israeli women with her hair loose, makeup, sunglasses and tight-fitting trousers. This she declined to do because it was against her religious beliefs.

Would a responsible religious leader anywhere please explain which is the greater sin for a Muslim? The moral dilemma is very simple for Jews and Christians. Why is it so difficult for Muslims?

Where do we draw the line?

Contrary to what Morton Weinfeld asserts in "Gay Pride in Jerusalem" (CJN, June 13), the issue is not one of tolerance versus intolerance. Rather, it's where exactly we draw the line. We're all tolerant, depending on the issue at hand. For instance, one would believe that all Jews would be appalled by parades celebrating bank robbery or bestiality as "alternative lifestyle." Those behaviours are forbidden by the Torah just as homosexual activity is forbidden.

Whether or not the rhetoric of certain politicians in criticizing homosexuality is appropriate under the circumstances is one thing. Nevertheless, Orthodox Jews are within their civic rights to protest the spending of public money on such a spiritually damaging campaign.

Is Israel better off now than 35 years ago?

This June marks the 35th year of the occupation of the West Bank and Gaza Strip. Two generations of Palestinians and Israelis have grown up with the occupation. As an Israeli-Canadian, I have to ask myself, is Israel more secure that it was 35 years ago? Are Israelis better off than they were 35 years ago? And what kind of people have we become in those 35 years?

Thirty-five years of occupation means that Israel has directly intervened in the lives of two generations of Palestinians. Thousands have been killed and tens of thousands arrested. Daily checkpoints on all major roads stop everyone. Everyone is searched and questioned. Houses and lives are destroyed in the name of Israel's security.

But today, Israel is less secure than at any other time in history. Today, more Israelis die from suicide bombs than on the battlefield. Israel is richer than it was 35 years ago but we are angrier and more intolerant. Today, the respected Jaffe Center for Strategic Studies reports that almost half of Jewish Israelis support the expulsion of Palestinians from the occupied territories, and close to 40 per cent support the expulsion of Arab-Israeli citizens from Israel.

Earlier this year, I wrote two letters criticizing the occupation, one to the Globe and Mail and one to the Toronto Star. After they were published, I received appalling and venomous hate mail, including death threats. All were from Jews. Canadian Jews have a proud history of supporting human rights and democracy. These calls and letters disgrace the community's heritage.

Israel can only survive if it is democratic and respects human rights. It is not a question of who was right, but where we go from here. Peace cannot happen unless the occupation is ended. Canadian Jews need to support an end to the occupation for the sake of Israel's safety, for the sake of Palestinian lives and for the sake of Jewish morality.

Waiting for Goisbault: The French government remains silent

By GERALDINE SHERMAN

It appears that the many supporters of Solidarity With Jews At Risk (SWJAR) who spent five nights standing vigil in front of the Bloor offices of the French Consulate in Toronto, obtaining hundreds of signatures on petitions, will never hear what the government of France has to say.

The hastily organized vigil was motivated by outrage at recent events in France. Hundreds of violent acts had been committed against Jewish property and people since September 9, 2000, the start of the current intifadah. Last fall, for instance, 200 Arabs attacked Jews in the Champs Elysee before Rosh Hashanah. Since then, Jewish schools have been vandalized, synagogues burned, cemeteries desecrated.

Geraldine Sherman

"Never again" seemed to be happening now and in France, culminating in neo-fascist, National Front leader Jean-Marie Le Pen winning a place in the presidential run-off against incumbent Jacques Chirac, a man whose own civil rights record is less than sterling. Weeks earlier, the French ambassador to Britain, Daniel Bernard, had called Israel a "shitty little country," adding, "Why should the world be in danger of World War III because of those people?" He remains in office.

The vigil's three organizers, Anna Morgan, Rachael Turkienicz and I, felt that government sponsored rhetoric against Israel and French Jews had served to inflame the population. "The point of the vigil," said Turkienicz, "was to demonstrate our solidarity with the Jews of France and implore the French government to do whatever was necessary to protect and defend this vulnerable group." We wanted to encourage politicians to work with their police, to tone down their rhetoric and to secure the safety of their Jewish communities. At the same time, we wanted to let French Jews know they were not facing this challenge alone, and to remind France that the world was watching.

Concerned Jews and non-Jews handed out information sheets and petitions on the street, in synagogues, schools, and study groups, asking for signatures to be sent to the Consul General of France in Toronto, M. Hugues Goisbault. The response was overwhelming. Articles appeared in The Canadian Jewish News, The Globe and Mail, The Toronto Star and the National Post, which also printed a letter from the organizers. The fax machine in the consul general's office must have whirred day and night. (So far as we know, New York was the only city outside Europe where a similar vigil was held.)

We waited for a response. None came.

Perhaps the consul general was unsure how to address his reply.

We recrafted our petition as a letter which was sent on May 8 and urged the French government to reply publicly.

"As founding members of Solidarity With Jews At Risk," we began, "we are gratified with the overwhelming turnout of voters in the French presidential election and the resounding defeat of Jean-Marie Le Pen." We said that we were also astounded by the number of Torontonians who came forward and signed our petition, and "while we support government actions taken so far by France to restrain inflammatory rhetoric and increase police protection for French Jews, we regard these as first steps only." We asked Goisbault to "please tell us, and the concerned public, what further measures this new government will enact to assure Jews all over the world that these barbarous crimes will not be tolerated and that France will enforce the rule of law and protect all its citizens, including Jews."

Two days later, we received a reply, which said, in part, that "security is one of the major issues for the new French government" and that they had formed a new ministry responsible for home affairs, internal security and local liberties and hoped to strengthen various police forces.

"The French authorities have always firmly condemned crimes against democracy. Exemplary sentences have been pronounced in order to punish any person committing any anti-Semitic connoted act on the French territory."

It concluded: "Please notice that France has never stopped denouncing and fighting against terrorism in the world, particularly condemning terrorist attacks in Israel. Today, our country is paying tribute to terrorism [sic]. The death of French citizens, victims of terrorist attacks in Pakistan testifies it."

We tried, initially, to make sense of the letter, to decode its message, especially the meaning of the repeated phrase, "anti-Semitic connoted acts." There was no mention of petitions, no recognition of the extent of the problem, no expression of responsibility or regret. We asked prominent members of the arts community to join us in a Standing Beside committee and received the support of Irving Abella, Margaret Atwood, June Callwood, Jacques Israelievitch, Norman Jewison, Mia Kirshner, David Mirvish, Peter C. Newman, Anna Porter, Jack Rabinovitch, Arlene Perly Rae, Heather Reisman, Mark Skazinetsky and Matthew Teitelbaum.

A new letter, with their names added, was sent on May 23, this time with a copy to the French ambassador in Ottawa, Philippe Guelluy. In it we expressed our shock and condolences to the people of France for the recent loss of innocent lives at the hands of terrorists in Pakistan, while stating that it was even more shocking when terrorism occurs in a country such as France. We mentioned once again recent incidents of anti-Semitic acts in France, adding that while we appreciated the initiative France appeared to be making to prevent future attacks, we needed some assurance that "the climate of intolerance that prevails in France" had also changed.

In addition, we stated that we expected the French government, through its consul general, "to make a public statement to reassure our concerned community that there is a recognition of omissions in the past as well as an invigorated policy for the future."

We said we looked forward to a public reply. A few days later, in a phone conversation with the ambassador's secretary, we were told that the letter had been received but "a reply is not forecasted."

Synagogue arson in France. [RNS/Reuters]

June 6. Still no word from the consul general of France in Toronto. We left messages for him to call one of the three original SWJAR organizers. He did not. In fact, we have been able to speak only to his secretary.

On May 31, one of the members of the Standing Beside committee met with the consul general on another matter and we were informed, through him, that Goisbault would be willing to meet informally with our committee at his official residence on June 10. He also passed on to us a sheaf of documents. They included, most notably, a statement from the ambassador's office entitled "Anti-Semitic connoted acts in France," an article in Le Monde by Jean Frydman, a Jewish businessman, and a letter by the ambassador published in the Ottawa Citizen.

The first document, dated April 11, states that "it is unacceptable to make the conclusion that France is going through a general renewal of anti-Semitic ideas... On the contrary, surveys show that the French population totally condemns these isolated acts."

It says that France "has always refused to confuse the Israeli-Palestinian conflict with anti-Semitic acts, which are to be condemned no matter what the context in the Middle East," but argues that "the resurgence of anti-Semitic acts is clearly linked to the situation in that region." In this official document, there were repeated denials of a problem as well as an attempt to offer assurance that security had been increased.

In the more disturbing Le Monde article, published April 9, the author wrote that while it's true there are anti-Semites in France as everywhere, "the existence of racist or anti-Semitic minorities has never meant that the country where they live was necessarily racist or anti-Semitic." As proof, he cited the many French who defended Alfred Dreyfus ("Which country went to the brink of civil war in order to defend the honour of an innocent Jewish officer?") and continued in a similarly incoherent fashion, mixing history and fiction.

Finally, there was the May 23 letter by the ambassador, published in the Ottawa Citizen, that stated his government's position: anti-Semitism is only a problem in France as it relates to the Middle East conflict.

On June 6, we informed the Standing Beside committee of our failure to receive a proper, public answer to the community's signed petitions or their personally endorsed letter. While SWJAR supports the French government's added measures to secure its Jewish citizens, we are concerned that they remain unwilling to make a clear, public statement admitting the history of French anti-Semitism or to acknowledge it as a particularly virulent problem today. For these reasons, we decided not to meet the consul general at this time. We are not alone in being met by silence from the French government.

Also on June 6, the French ambassador to the United States abruptly cancelled a long-scheduled meeting with 100 American Jewish leaders, saying that the representative of a sovereign state doesn't meet with non-governmental groups – this despite the fact that the event had been co-sponsored by the Republican Jewish Coalition and the Senate Republican Policy Conference.

More worrying still, on June 10, the Simon Wiesenthal Center issued a stern reminder that while some things change, others seem immutable: "The continuing attacks on Jews in France, which have been more numerous than in any other western country, are being carried out against the background of alarming indifference, with citizens and government leaders turning a blind eye. This indifference, coupled with the threat of anti-Semitism and the verifiably documented acts of violence, are prompting a continued feeling of utter abandonment within France's Jewish community."

SWJAR has succeeded in making our own community aware of the plight of French Jews. We have failed, so far, to make the French government behave responsibly. It seems that half a victory will have to do for now.

A day in my life

Several times recently, I have been asked how I manage to get started every morning with my work in its various aspects. The question assumes that my routine is always the same and, in a broad sense, that is indeed so.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Physical and spiritual ablutions start my day. Then comes breakfast, during which I listen to the radio and manage to read as much of the morning paper as my temperament is willing to allow. I try not to overload the early morning hours with bad news, for that would inevitably throw a pall over the rest of the day.

Since I subscribe to a variety of e-mailed news updates, most of them concerned with Jewish affairs and problems, I am quickly tuned in to the major issues that face our people. I also have requests to comment on certain matters, and a half-dozen letters require answers, and sometimes they are double in number. After two hours or so in front of the computer, which lasts until about 9 a.m., I can make some telephone calls and attend to other matters.

But then, after a while, the realities of existence will assert themselves: There's my daily visit to the hospital to see my wife, who has been lying there for more than two years now, unable to communicate – but she is alive and as beautiful as ever, and she will always be part of my existence as long as she keeps on breathing.

Otherwise, my life is pretty much like that of most of my readers, I suppose. I have my joys, I have my family, my friends, my books and my music, and in that way I am never quite alone – although I must admit that I do feel lonely from time to time.

There is an unfinished novel that awaits my daily input. There is also so much to read, both in my computer and in my books that clutter the desk, that the hours pass quickly, and I find that there is always too little time. But as long as I can read, and function reasonably well, I have no complaints. I am fortunate to have family and friends who stand by me when I need them.

Sometime later this year – if all is well – I hope to celebrate my 90th birthday, and when that happens, I will let you know how it feels to reach that age.

Meanwhile, keep reading my column, and I'll keep on writing it!

It's Istanbul, not Constantinople, now

Forty years ago, when I taught English in the public high school in Bursa, Turkey, I had only one Jewish student. I found one Jewish shopkeeper in Bursa's bazaar. Near my apartment was a simple, sequestered synagogue. Travelling down the Turkish coast, I passed a wedding party (of Turks) happily dancing to Hava Nagilah, even though this song may have been their only exposure to Jewish culture.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Yet, Jewish history in Asia Minor goes back to before Hellenistic times. For instance, in Sardis, a Greco-Roman city, lie remains of Jewish shops. Later, Byzantine Jewry was overwhelmed by exiles fleeing the blood-soaked Spanish Catholic monarchs. The descendants of those exiles form today's 500-year old Turkish Jewish community.

However, I had not learned much about their lives when I was a young English teacher, so on my return to celebrate the 40th anniversary of the Peace Corps in Turkey, I made an effort to see what their lives are like today.

About 27,000 Jews live in Turkey, 2,500 in Izmir, 180 in Bursa, and most of the rest in Istanbul. Turkey's treatment of its Jews, with the exception of a period during World War II when many males were interned in camps, has been excellent. Thousands found refuge there during the war, despite the horrific sinking of the Struma.

In the Ottoman Empire's glory days, Jews were part of the business class and even advisors to sultans. Their decline in power matched that of the Ottoman Empire. After Ataturk's revolution and the emergence of modern Turkey, Jews remained unmolested. My interviews in Izmir and Istanbul were with people who feel at home in Turkey, even as their children and relatives continue to leave.

My husband and I arrived in Izmir on erev Shabbat and found the synagogue. By chance, as we arrived there, so did a young woman paying her daughter's fees for a weekend retreat with other Jewish kids in Istanbul. Tilda has her own business and her husband is – what else – a computer techie. One daughter attends a private high school in Izmir, the other university in Istanbul. Do they have Muslim friends? Of course. Are they afraid? Of course not. They have relatives in Israel; their daughter has been there. Just the same, they don't discuss Israel with their Muslim friends. But "life is good." We thanked her and left the synagogue, skirting the armed guard outside the building. Since an attack on an Istanbul shul in 1986, all synagogues have armed guards.

In order to attend synagogue in Istanbul, we must call the chief rabbi's office, send copies of our passport, hotel name, and the name of the synagogue that we want to attend.

After that, we went to the office of the weekly Jewish newspaper, Shalom, (published in Turkish and Ladino) for an interview with its editor. We talked about youth and the future of the Jewish community. Istanbul boasts one Jewish day school, Ulus (where my Izmir friend's daughter spent the weekend). Today, Jews enter professions at will, mirroring the shift from business to professional life in Jewish communities worldwide. And like elsewhere in the West, intermarriage is beginning to take its toll.

At one time Jews lived in a suburb, Kuzguncuk, among a mixed population of Christians and Muslims, now home to an artist colony and a largely Muslim population. Today Jews live scattered all around Istanbul.

Why do Jews continue to leave Turkey? Many study abroad, mostly in the United States, and many of them stay, since prospects seem brighter there.

The interview took place as Israel was chasing terrorists in Jenin. How has that situation, and Prime Minister Bulent Ecevit's recent accusation of Israeli genocide against the Palestinians, affected Turkey's Jews? Like others we spoke with, the editor attributes Ecevit's comment to Parkinson's disease. The media has been critical of Israel, but the community works with them to explain Israel's position. There is always the problem, according to her, of the media not distinguishing between Turkey's Jews and Israeli policy. I knew I was on home ground there!

What will be the future of this ancient community? Turkey, a country of 70,000,000, is a burly, quiescent giant in the region, a secular Muslim country with close ties to the United States, Israel and the European Union, which it wants to join.

The bottom line may be that, if Turkey prospers, its Jews will prosper. If it falters, then its minorities may take the heat. For now, however, "life is good."

Losing games, finding balance

I've been playing B'nai Brith softball for about ten years. In that time, I've lost about 200 games and won maybe 50.

Two hundred times I've lined up to shake hands with my opponents after losing a game. They used to say "good game" as they shook hands. In later years, as the teams I played for got worse and worse, they said "thanks." After our most recent 30-8 shellacking, some of the opposing players just said "hey" and flashed a sympathetic look and nod – the type you might give in a shivah house.

Stuart Shaven in Winnipeg

The team I play for now—the Diamonds—is, well, not very good. We haven't won yet this year and the season is about one third over. Last week, during a 28-0 loss, it occurred to me that we have become just like the Washington Generals, that rag-tag crew of fair to middling basketballers who get demolished by the Harlem Globetrotters in every game. In fact, I could have sworn I heard one of our opponents hum Sweet Georgia Brown, the Globetrotters' theme song, as he rounded second base.

Our base running is suspect. We make bad decisions in the field. And, as far as hitting goes, most of us haven't had this much trouble getting to first base since we started dating in high school.

But what we are good at is shmoozing on the bench, going for beer a few times a season and sharing a few laughs. And that's the point of it all. We may play for the love of the game, but we play in a Jewish league because we're looking for more than competition. We're looking for community, camaraderie and connection.

Despite a busy home and work schedule, I make a point of playing ball every year. It's not for the exercise—as a Diamond infielder, I seldom budge and I'm not doing a great deal of base running. Putting handfuls of sunflower seeds into my mouth is as close as I get to exercising during a game. (We're not 100 per cent certain, but when I came home from a game last week, my wife thought she saw moss growing on me.)

What keeps me playing ball is my desire for balance in my life between work and play. I think what brings me back to a Jewish softball league in particular is the desire to participate in a communal activity that isn't all about obligation.

Just like we need balance in our day-to-day lives, we need balance in our Jewish communal experiences as well. While each person's ideal blend of communal experience differs, I suspect we all need doses of spiritual experience, community service, social life and recreation.

Earlier this year, I resigned from a volunteer position with a Jewish organization. After about 15 years of service on various Jewish boards and committees, I had simply burned out. My Jewish communal experience stopped being fun; it stopped being meaningful (even though I am passionate about the last organization I worked with). Too many meetings; too many reports; too many details; too much politics. My Jewish communal balance was way off.

Even though I've been playing for a decade, I have found that since resigning from my position, Jewish league softball has become more important to me than ever before.

I have come to learn that it is about more than play. It's about connection. There are even times when playing baseball contributes to my spiritual awareness as well, as I find myself saying things like: "Oh, God, I wish we could win a game!" and "Oh, God, I hope he doesn't hit it toward me!"and "Oh, God, are we pathetic!"

As an active volunteer, I found myself becoming resentful and bored. By taking a short leave from volunteerism, I am restoring the balance that had been missing for so long.

This break from committee work will ultimately make me a better volunteer when I return. For now, I just need some Jewish-flavoured play time. We all need it sometimes. I'll get back onto boards soon enough; for now, I just want to get on base.

Marcel Reich-Ranicki delves into his life

Marcel Reich-Ranicki, whom I had the pleasure of interviewing 14 years ago in Frankfurt, is Germany's foremost man of letters, a literary critic whose commentaries can make or break a writer.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The epitome of the cultured German intellectual, he has written for Germany's leading publications, from Die Zeit to Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, has hosted popular radio and television programs and has written penetrating books dissecting German literature.

And yet, Reich-Ranicki refuses to call himself a German. "I have no country of my own, no homeland, no fatherland," he writes in his engaging memoir, The Author of Himself (Princeton University Press).

One can understand his reticence. He was born in Poland in 1920, in the city of Wloclawek, but lived in Germany from the late 1920s onward. There, in Berlin, partly under his mother's influence, he developed an enduring affection for the German language. Expelled from Germany in 1938, Reich-Ranicki was plunged into the despair of the brutal German occupation of Poland.

After the war, he worked for Poland's intelligence service and foreign ministry. But regarding Poland as an "alien country," he moved to Germany, where he honed his talents as Germany's leading authority on German literature. Despite his fame and fortune, Reich-Ranicki could never forget the past. And in The Author of Himself, he delves into it with gusto and brooding contemplation.

His father, David, a businessman, was born in Plotsk, which in the 19th century had been a part of Prussia. His mother, Helene, the daughter of a rabbi, was a Prussian Jew steeped in German culture. On her initiative, Reich-Ranicki attended a German-language primary school. When his father's business failed, the family relocated to Berlin. There, amid the comings and goings of the Weimar Republic, he learned to appreciate the love of his life – German literature.

Not long after the Nazis came to power, one of his teachers was transferred to another school after he had the temerity to criticize the new Germany's state anti-Semitism. Reich-Ranicki recalls this man, an avatar of German idealism, with great fondness.

Reich-Ranicki also has clear recollections of his Jewish religion instructor, Max Nussbaum, who immigrated to the United States and became a rabbi in Hollywood (where he converted Elizabeth Taylor, Sammy Davis Jr. and Marilyn Monroe).

As Hitler tightened his grip on Germany, Jewish pupils like himself were gradually excluded from school activities and excursions. His teachers, Nazis or not, generally treated their Jewish students decently and correctly. Lacking money, contacts and initiative, his parents did not think of emigrating.

During this uncertain period, he decided he would be a critic. So it is not surprising that what he feared most was being prohibited, as a Jew, from going to theatres and opera houses.

Due to the anti-Semitic policies of the day, Reich-Ranicki was not admitted to the university of his choice. As a result, he missed out on a university education. It was a grievous blow: "I was never able to make up for what was denied me then." But, as he subsequently elaborates, his failure to reach academe was not fatal. "Whatever I can do I have taught myself," he writes. "I became a self-taught person through necessity."

Two weeks before Kristallnacht, he was ordered out of Germany, along with 18,000 other Jews of Polish nationality. "This was the first officially organized mass deportation of Jews," he writes.

In Warsaw, Reich-Ranicki earned pocket money as a tutor in German. He never doubted the ultimate victory of the Allies in World War II, but he greatly feared that terrible things lay in store for Jews. By contrast, his mother never lost her faith in German order and justice.

He met his wife-to-be, Teofila Langnas, in wartime Warsaw, and they shared their ordeal together. Given the opportunity to escape from the ghetto, she chose to remain with him. Ever the critic, he observes: "For a woman to risk her life in order to save her friend, lover or husband – that was a theme I was familiar with from operas, ballads and short stories."

Thanks to his stellar knowledge of German, he was engaged by the German-controlled Jewish Council as a translator. "For the first time in my life I was needed."

The ghetto, as he recalls, was hideous. "Death was encountered... at every step. I mean this quite literally: In the gutter, especially in the early morning, scantily covered with old newspapers, lay the corpses of those who had died of debility or hunger or typhus and whose burial nobody wished to pay for."

There was only one automobile in the ghetto and it belonged to Adam Czerniakow, his boss. Reich-Ranicki has mixed feelings about him. At the request of ghetto historian Emanuel Ringelblum, he prepared copies of the correspondence between the Jewish Council and the German occupiers. These priceless archives were placed in 10 metal containers and two milk churns and buried for safekeeping.

Although Reich-Ranicki never harboured illusions about what awaited Polish Jews, he did not believe the rumours about their mass murder. "That the aim [of the Germans] was the Final Solution did not occur to anyone."

Marcel Reich-Ranicki

Reich-Ranicki witnessed the 1942 deportation of Jews from Warsaw to Treblinka. His parents were among the doomed. "The following day I bumped into the commander of the Jewish militia at the embarkation point... He told me: 'I gave your parents a loaf of bread – more than that I couldn't do for them. And then I helped them up into the truck.'"

Though not a member of the Jewish Fighting Organization, which resisted the 1943 liquidation of the ghetto, Reich-Ranicki participated in one of its operations. This enabled him and Teofila to escape into the countryside.

Hidden by a Polish peasant, they spent two years cowering in a cellar and in an attic. In postwar Poland, he worked for the ministry of public security. Then he was a postal censor and secret service agent.

Reich-Ranicki joined the Communist party in 1945. He felt indebted to the Red Army, which had driven the Germans out of Poland. And he jumped at the chance to join a universal movement which sought to solve the great problems of our time. Later, he would regret his decision.

At the age of 28, he was appointed vice-consul at the Polish embassy in London, a position that required him to spy on Polish exiles. But having been branded as an ideological subversive, he was soon dismissed and kicked out of the Communist party. Reich-Ranicki became a translator, book reviewer and author. Anti-Semitism in Poland had bubbled to the surface, alienating him from his birthplace.

He landed in Germany in 1958, unknown but undaunted. "Naturally, I had to start at the top. I had no sooner arrived in Frankfurt than I went to the offices of Frankfurter Allgemeine." The arts editor accepted his book review, and he was launched on what would be an illustrious career.

He began writing for Die Welt, a mass-circulation conservative daily, and for Die Ziet, a left-of-centre weekly favoured by intellectuals. In 1963, he wrote his first book in the West, German Literature in West and East, and in 1964, he initiated a radio series, Literary Coffee House. By 1970, he was ready to write a book of profiles of important German literary critics. In 1988, he began hosting Literary Quartet, a TV show whose popularity made him a household name.

Before leaving Die Ziet in 1973, Reich-Ranicki lectured in Sweden, Australia and New Zealand. Then he was offered a plum job he could not refuse: the directorship of Frankfurter Allgemeine's literary section, possibly his most important position.

His main achievement there, he says, was "bridging the traditional gulf between academic German scholarship and literary criticism." For all his accomplishments, Reich-Ranicki left the newspaper in a huff. He and his editor, Joachim Fest, had enjoyed a fruitful and cordial professional relationship. But it turned frosty when Fest, a biographer of Hitler, tried to relativize Nazi crimes.

Reich-Ranicki was also annoyed when Fest published articles by historian Ernst Nolte, who claimed the Holocaust had not been the fault of the Germans, but the outcome of European fascism and anti-Semitism.

For Reich-Ranicki, it was the final straw. As he explains: "The political and moral consensus which had existed between us regarding the Third Reich and its consequences, the consensus that was fundamental to my work on Frankfurter Allgemeine, and indeed my whole existence (in Germany)... was needlessly, indeed wantonly, destroyed by Joachim Fest."

It's a pity that The Author of Himself concludes on such a sour note. But at least Reich-Ranicki does not try to sugar-coat this unpleasant incident.

Suicide attacks pose threat to both sides: Rae

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Bob Rae says it's time to press for a paradigm shift in discussions about the Middle East.

The former Ontario premier returned last month from an intensive five-day trip to Israel along with eight other lawyers to learn about the system of justice and human rights advocacy there, meeting with Israeli legal experts, Palestinian Authority spokespeople, professors, members of Knesset and IDF advisers.

"For a long time, I think the assumption has been that if only Israel would withdraw from the occupied territories, the solution would logically come," said Rae, speaking recently to an invited group at a downtown law office as a guest of the Jewish Civil Rights Educational Foundation of Canada.

The event, one in an ongoing series that began 30 years ago, was organized by Toronto lawyer Bert Raphael.

Rae, who is now a partner in a law firm and an adjunct professor at the University of Toronto, also criticized the notion that if Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon were not in power, the problem would not exist.

Although Rae has never been an enthusiastic proponent of Israeli settlements, the premise that withdrawal from the territories would bring peace is "essentially wrong," he said.

"It's impossible to expect the Israeli population to accept the meaningfulness of negotiation with someone [who] has proven to be incompetent, unwilling and incapable of stopping the suicide murders."

Those attacks, said Rae, threaten not only Israel's sovereignty, but the Palestinians' own "supposed capacity" for sovereignty. Until they stop, he said, there's no basis for discussion.

A second paradigm shift, to which governments have to respond, is the "convergence of the old anti-Semitism and the new anti-Semitism into some awful, powerful, virulent virus which we're seeing in many manifestations."

Under the old paradigm, anti-Semitism was a thing of the past, but the promotion of hatred and "disgusting [anti-Semitic] propaganda" is not only tolerated in the Arab world but accepted as true, he said.

"If children in refugee camps and schools in the Middle East are being fed this vitriol, we have to do whatever we can to stop it, to insist that we understand that this infects opinion and the whole climate of civility which is a precondition for coexistence."

The hatred is reflected in growing anti-Semitism in Europe and North America, he added. "You have to ask yourself whether something deeper isn't at stake and happening in the post-September 11 world."

Canada is not immune, said Rae. "We have leaders who are committed to tolerance and fighting hatred, but we have to recognize that there are comments made about Israel which, frankly, encourage this re-emergence. I think we have to have the guts to say we can't accept this."

The old Canadian view, said Rae, is that the solution to a problem is somewhere between the two positions. "Well, not necessarily. You have to have some moral and political criteria."

Rae was troubled by the PA "climate of concern and fear" that holds Palestinian moderates back from speaking publicly. "People who stand up and say these [types of moderate] things a lot, end up not being around very long."

"To be fair," he added, "I think there's also a very strong sense within the Palestinian community that there are some real issues that Israel's going to have to come to grips with, that if the occupation continues indefinitely – and it's continued for over 30 years – there are some real issues around what happens to the civil relationship between the communities."

Attention has to be shifted to the type of state the Palestinian Authority will be, he believes. "Are the civil institutions going to be allowed to emerge, which will give it legitimacy and capacity to govern?" he asked.

"Sovereign states define themselves by their capacity to enjoin their citizens from carrying out acts of hostility against others."

Although the Palestinians "claim – assert – that their aspiration is to have a state, there does not yet appear to be an understanding or appreciation of the essential compromise that that objective assumes," Rae said.

Preconditions for having a state include having rules and laws, the capacity to enforce the laws, and an acceptance of the legal obligation to recognize neighbouring jurisdictions, he added.

Rae blamed the persistence of what he called "apocalyptic thinking" among the Palestinians for causing the "grim daily reality of having to govern" to become "comparatively unromantic and uninteresting."

Although Israel has its internal challenges, he noted, it is intensely concerned about law, rules, rights, and limits of power to the point where Israeli military activities are subject to judicial review.

Rae said the Palestinians in refugee camps have been used as pawns in a horrible game for a very long time. He believes that, ultimately, Egypt, Jordan and other Arab countries will have to be part of the refugee solution.

Jewish high schools reach for the top

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

For the first time ever, students from two Jewish high schools found themselves in Edmonton competing for the Reach For The Top trophy.

After winning their respective provincial rounds, the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) and Winnipeg's Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate (JWC) proceeded to the national games.

Reach For The Top is a television quiz show, which began in 1961, where high school students compete for points by answering general knowledge questions.

Competitions begin at the city level with winners going on to provincial games. Finalists proceed to the nationals – Ontario and Manitoba send their top two high schools – and face off in fierce high-speed rounds of educational trivia.

For many years, School Reach, as the show is also known, was played without much media attention, said CHAT game coach Richard Stoll, who has been preparing students for the event for the past 16 years.

With Joe Motiki as provincial game show host and Daniel Richler quizzing at the nationals, Reach For The Top has reemerged this time around with a newer funkier style in an effort to be more appealing to the teenage audience, Stoll said.

From the exhibition matches against various staff members to round table challenges against other schools, the energy level remains high.

To survive Ontario, "You need to be good and fast," Stoll said, adding that you also need a bit of luck.

First of all, he said, the current team – Jonathan Klein, Adam Lazier, Andrew Segal, Mark Edelstein and Jared Gordon – was very strong.

But, he noted, it was also fortunate for CHAT that Earl Haig Secondary School didn't play this year because they've been hard to beat.

At the provincials, the only team to trump CHAT was the University of Toronto Schools. CHAT and UTS were the Ontario representatives in Edmonton.

"Ten years ago, Winnipeg's Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate won the Manitoba provincials, but they didn't play the nationals because they chose to go on their annual trip to Israel," JWC coach Tom Blair said.

With this year's trip cancelled, Wolinsky students – Eytan Perl, Matthew Leibl, Ruban Kellen, Richard Winograd and Lewis Robinovitch – found themselves with the time to proceed to the next stage of the games.

Once the teams were in Edmonton, the Jewish community was very helpful arranging for kosher food and Shabbat accommodations, Stoll said, adding that throughout the process, Reach For The Top director Paul Russell helped them with their needs. For example, Saturday games were rescheduled for the CHAT students and kosher food was provided at the Edmonton banquet.

There were Jewish holiday questions also thrown into the mix.

The students from the Jewish day schools sometimes missed those questions because it "just depended on how fast the players were with the buzzer," Stoll said.

There is certainly a level of alertness needed to deal with the tension and still be first on the draw, said CHAT team player Jonathan Klein.

But it was also just fun to hang out with other kids who share the same interests in these kinds of competitions, Klein said.

The finalists formed friendships during the games and as they made their way towards the trophy, the tension built as shut-out team members began rooting for their new friends.

And the winner?

The shows will be broadcast on ACCESS from June 26 to July 10 at 5 p.m. (reruns on July 22 to August 5) and on Canadian Learning Television sometime in the fall.

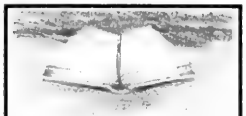
Jewish Life

Are you yashar?

By RABBI MOSHE J. YERES

With the commemoration of the Seventeenth of Tammuz on June 27, the Jewish calendar enters the sad period called the Three Weeks when we recall events that led up to the destruction of both the First and Second Temples. Our tradition teaches that every year at this time we should reassess why we still exist in exile and have not yet merited the Temple's rebuilding and our ultimate ingathering.



Rabbinic Reflections

The great sage, Rabbi Naftali Tzvi Yehuda Berlin (1817-1893), head of the Yeshiva in Volozhin and known by his initials Netziv, noted in the introduction to his biblical commentary Ha'amek Davar that in rabbinic literature, the book of Genesis is also called the Sefer Hayashar – the Book of the Just. The name, writes the Netziv, reflects the uniqueness of our Patriarchs, Avraham, Yitzchak and Yaacov, that they dealt with all those they came in contact with in a manner that was not just legally correct, but morally and ethically exemplary (i.e., yashar) as well.

Regardless of an individual's status as an idol worshipper who at times may not have had the Patriarchs' good in their hearts, the Patriarchs acted toward them with love, going beyond the strict letter of the law. Avraham, for example prayed to save the wicked of Sodom. Yitzchak made a pact of friendship with Avimelech the Philistine, and so on. Our first biblical book, therefore, reflects this founding ideal of our people with the accolade Sefer Hayashar – the Book of the Just.

The Netziv continues and notes that in Moses' last soliloquy prophecy, the poem of Parshat Ha'azinu, a premonition of the Second Temple's destruction and the exile are found in Deuteronomy 32, 4-5: "Hatzur tamim pa'alo... tzaddik veyashar hu. Shichet lo... dor ikesh ufitalto." ("The Rock, his work is perfect... just and right is he. They [Bnei Yisrael] have dealt corruptly... they are a perverse and crooked generation.") As the Netziv points out, Moses' prophetic words were meant as a tziduk hadin – an acceptance of God's judgment against the Jewish people for the ruin of the Second Temple and our present exile.

What do these words actually signify? The Netziv writes that the Jews of the Second Temple era were not wicked or bad per se, or even idol worshippers. In fact they were "good and diligent in Torah." But they had one failing, a flaw the Almighty considered so serious that He removed His protective shield from them. The Jews treated each other without the modicum of respect; their conduct to each other was not yashar. The sinat chinam (baseless hatred) they maintained to other Jews led them to suspect and label as Sadducean, agnostic or heretical any belief and behaviour that did not exactly match their own. Because of this, emphasizes the Netziv, the Jews came to disunity, violence and, eventually, communal self-destruction and exile. The decree to destroy the Temple was thus justified; for God is yashar and cannot tolerate such "crooked" behaviour, though it may have been done with the purest of intentions. Such actions, to quote the Netziv, "only cause destruction of God's creation and the settlement of the land of Israel."

The matzav, as the present situation in Israel has come to be called, has caused Diaspora Jewry to focus on our support and connection to the Jews in Israel. The message of the Netziv – and it's the message for these Three Weeks of introspection – is for us to also focus on relationships in our own communities as a way to further the process for peace and restoration for Eretz Yisrael and Klal Yisrael. Suddenly, the oft-used term yiyasher kochacha – may your strength be yashar – takes on added meaning.

Rabbi Moshe J. Yeres is head of Rabbinics and Talmud at the Richmond Hill campus of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

A Cry for Peace

By LEON KRYM

Oh Abraham "Father of Nations."
Your name is inspiring.
Your status overwhelming.

"And I will give unto Thee,
And to Thy seed after Thee,
The land of Thy sojournings,
All the land of Canaan,
For an everlasting possession."*

...And the farmers are toiling the land.
Wilderness made into blooming orchards
Swamps into fertile ground.
Bricklayers, building homes, houses,
Cities and towns.
And the Dead Sea, "alive" and thriving
In the Judean Desert.

Jerusalem of Gold, the City of David.
Home of Three Holy Shrines.
Inspiration to the faithful, the worshippers,
And the pilgrims.

Blessed are the inhabitants
Of the land of "Milk and Honey."

Yet, envy and hatred consume
The House of Ishmael,
Conquest admire, a burning desire,
Israel entire.
Today: Tel Aviv, Haifa, Jerusalem.
Tomorrow: Paris, London, New York.

Shooting, stabbing vendors and shoppers
On the markets, streets and alleys

Mothers, babies, Jerusalem
Blown apart by "holy weapons"
Of the Jihad, Hamas and Al-Aqsa killers –
Preached by the Mullahs
From the pulpit in the mosque.

And the House of Israel,
Amid explosions and suicide bombers,
Calling on our "Fathers Abraham,"
"The father of Nations" – yours and ours –
A cry for peace not war
Friend, not foe.

Israel,
Although painfully shaken
But strong and resilient.
Bruised and wounded
Yet, confident and determined
Will steadfastly defend our land,
Homes, families and Jerusalem.

"Ma Tovu Oholecha Yaacov Mishkenoteha Israel"

"How good are thy tents, O Jacob Thy dwellings, O Israel."

Rabbi Shmuley Boteach on Judaism

Judaism for Everyone*, by Shmuley Boteach, Basic Books, 2002, $41.50.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Only 36, Rabbi Shmuley Boteach, a quite unorthodox orthodox rabbi, is a phenomenon: founder of Oxford University's L'Chaim society, author of 13 books, including the recent bestselling Kosher Sex, a frequent guest on TV and radio shows around the world and an untiring advocate of a rejuvenated Judaism for our time.

It must be emphasised that this book is not the usual how-to guide to Jewish ritual and practice. It presents the basic ideas of Judaism in a universal and philosophical context.

The author believes that Judaism, "with its strong ethical emphasis, can serve as an inspiration for modern-day men and women who long for a spirituality that will make them into better people – teaching them how to be more happily married, raise more secure children and channel their ambition into purposeful action."

Rabbi Boteach is uncompromising in his defence of traditional Judaism. "By rejecting the supremacy of Jewish law as the consummate vehicle by which man comes close to God, and embracing a more palatable, comfortable and rational Judaism, Reform Judaism, notwithstanding the nobility of its intentions, is guilty of rejecting God's right to be more than human – in fact, to be God, and thus not always accessible to temporal intelligence."

This view, simply presented but not pursued, presents a variety of theological problems that the author does not address.

Tolerance is a value, Rabbi Boteach maintains, that Judaism can teach world religions. Jews have never insisted that their beliefs are superior to others. Nor have the Jews ever persecuted another nation for not adopting Judaism. The rabbis of the Talmud taught: "Do not despise any man" (Ethics of the Fathers, chap. 4). Hence, racism and the hatred of other tolerant faiths is an unforgivable sin in Judaism.

Likewise, the rabbis declared, "Even a Gentile who studies God's law is equal to a high Priest" (Bava Kamah 38a). These rabbis saw God's salvation freely available to all men and women.

Life and abundance are pillars of Jewish belief and action. Though death and mortality were their constant companions, the Jews still pulled out the best bottle of wine they could every Friday night and festival eve, and made a toast to life. Judaism has never been a religion of cemeteries, tombs and mass graves. Rather, it has been the religion of young children, families, communities and the living Torah, which has sustained and animated this most ancient people through every trial.

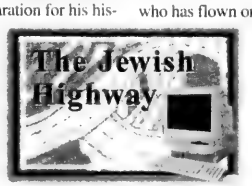
Above everything else, the author, in this thoughtful, informative and often inspiring, work insists that Judaism "is not just a collection of ideas. More significantly, it is a program of action by which to bring Godly ethics and values to mankind, ensuring that they take root within the individual and each successive generation. The purpose of Judaism is to translate spiritual abstractions into a tangible reality that becomes an inseparable part of human living."

Undauntedly optimistic, the author predicts that more and more non-Jews will want to study Judaism and will use it to further their spiritual growth and ethical development. This will happen, not because Judaism is a better religion than the world's other great faiths, but because it is more suited to our times.

"A Jewish wave is coming. For 11 years in Oxford, I witnessed it swelling. It will make a great splash in all the world's cities. Scores of non-Jews will surf its crest. My hope is that this book will serve as a beachhead where all can land safely."

Jews in space – part 1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ



In a few weeks, Israelis and Jews everywhere will look to the heavens even more than usual as Ilan Ramon, Israel's first astronaut, lifts off aboard the space shuttle Columbia. We'll learn more about Ramon next week, but in preparation for his historic mission, here's a look at Jews in space in fact and fiction.

The first Jewish astronaut and the second American female in space was Judith Resnick, who first flew during the maiden flight of the Discovery in August 1984. [http://www.christa.org/resnick.htm] Resnick was chosen to fly again in January 1986 aboard the Challenger, in which she perished along with rest of the crew shortly after launch. [http://www.pao.ksc.nasa.gov/kscpao/shuttle/missions/51-l/mission-51-l.html]

A special plaque in memory of the Challenger astronauts has been dedicated in Arlington National Cemetery. You can see the plaque and read more about the mission at the Arlington National Cemetery Web site [http://www.arlingtoncemetery.com/challengr.htm].

Several other Jewish astronauts have followed Resnick into space, including career test pilot Scott Horowitz, who has been in space four times [http://www.jewishsf.com/bk960216/uspilot.htm] In 1996, astronaut Jeffrey Hoffman took a "Space Torah" on board his shuttle and then returned it to his congregation, Houston's Or Hadash. The synagogue's Web site praises its member for demonstrating "that one could embrace traditional Jewish values and yet venture into the newest frontiers of human existence." [http://members.aol.com/orhadash1/mehadash.htm]

In a wonderful article in Hadassah Magazine, Miryam Wahrman speaks to another Jewish astronaut, David Wolf, who has flown on three shuttle flights. In addition, Wolf spent four months aboard the Russian space station Mir, including a Chanukah that was out of this world. Although Wolf brought along a menorah, he couldn't light it because open flames would have posed a serious risk in the oxygen-rich atmosphere. So Wolf took advantage of zero gravity to enjoy another tradition: "I probably have the record dreidel spin; it went for about an hour and a half until I lost it. It showed up a few weeks later in an air filter. I figure it went about 25,000 miles." [http://www.hadassah.org/NEWS/archive/2001/march01/profile.htm] You can find David Wolf's official bio on the NASA site. [http://www.jsc.nasa.gov/Bios/htmbios/wolf.html]

Although Jews may be relatively new to space, they have done a great deal to shape how our world views outer space. I was intrigued by the article Jewish Visions of the Fantastical Future, which looks at the work of filmmakers ranging from Stanley Kubrick 2001: A Space Odyssey to Woody Allen Sleeper. "While Jewish science fiction teems with stock images of aliens, spaceships, and robots, it is distinctive for its futuristic interpretations of ancient Jewish mythical tales. In contemporary science fiction, dybbuks and golems metamorphose into robots and computers. The veneer is different, the landscape futuristic, but the underlying themes and archetypes of classic Jewish tales persist, linking Jewish past and future." [http://www.jewishculture.org/currents/0001current.htm] For more on Jews, science fiction and the future, see Jonathan Tobin's The search for Jews in outer space continues [http://www.jewishworldreview.com/cols/tobin051399.asp].

Of course, no discussion about Jewish and space would be complete without a nod to one of the most popular space adventures of them all, Star Trek. Although there haven't been any famous Jewish astronauts aboard the various Enterprises, the Star Trek series have had no shortage of Jewish performers, including William Shatner (Capt. James T. Kirk), Walter Koenig (Cmdr. Pavel Chekov) and Brent Spiner as the very popular android, Data.

But the individual who has left the most indelible mark on Star Trek is Leonard Nimoy, who as the Vulcan science officer Spock adapted the hand salute that Nimoy had seen in synagogue during Birkat Kohanim, the Priestly Blessing [http://members.rogers.com/nimoyleonard/nimoy_startrek.html]

As Nimoy explained to the New York Times [http://www.ajc.org/JewishLife/BeingJewishDetail.asp?did=199&pid=289], "Why did I think back to that hand gesture? Actors are always looking for something personal to bring to their professional lives. Maybe, then, it was the convergence of my spiritual and artistic lives. Maybe, in a way, I can call that salute my Vulcan shalom, my greeting of peace, my yearning for the blessing of peace – the age-old quest of the Jewish people, my people."

Mixed reports on summer Israel trips

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

All things considered, the Canadian arm of Birthright Israel is doing pretty well.

Next week three busloads of Canadians will tour Israel on the free, 10-day trip for 18-to-26-year-olds. That's one bus – about 40 people – less than at the same time last summer, which is not a significant decline, says Adam Minsky, director of Israel and Overseas Programs for Canada Israel Experience (CIE).

Overall, the number of North American young adults visiting the Jewish state this summer is down by an estimated 50 to 90 per cent from 2000, the last summer before the violent Palestinian intifadah began driving away tourists.

Advocates for such programs worry that even if the situation in Israel improves, it will take a long time to rebuild their infrastructure and convince North American Jews that Israel trips are an important rite of passage.

One thing that is different for Birthright this year, Minsky said, is the lack of a waiting list. Earlier in the intifadah, spots were filled quickly when participants pulled out.

He attributes the earlier spate of cancellations to the abrupt change in Israel's situation. "This time, we don't have a large number of cancellations," Minsky said.

When current registrants signed up, they already knew what to expect in terms of the volatility of the situation and the security precautions taken, which are not changing substantively this summer, Minsky said.

At a time when many providers of Israel trips for young adults are lamenting the decrease in participants, CIE is seeing an increase in the area of volunteer programs, particularly among young people who have already been to Israel.

"It really speaks to the impact of the Israel experience," Minsky said. About 70 people have already been on such programs, and another 70 are expected to make the trip over the summer.

"We've managed to shift gears and focus more on the volunteer programs and second-time programs," said Minsky. "That has kept the numbers up in Canada."

Certainly high school and youth movement programs have been affected, he noted. "We're hoping it will be a temporary thing."

In response, CIE and Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, along with other organizations, are sending more than two dozen Israeli shlichim to spend time at Jewish overnight camps this summer, bringing a taste of Israel with them. The program began last year as a pilot and was expanded into a national program this year.

The Reform movement, once the largest provider of teen trips to Israel is sending only 20 to 30 kids this summer. There is only one Canadian participant. Two years ago, 1,391 youngsters took part in their program. Last year, the Union of American Hebrew Congregations – the Reform umbrella – cancelled its teen programs in Israel altogether.

Tamara Kochberg, regional youth director for United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, Canadian region, has mixed reports about her movement's summer Israel trips.

This summer, there are six Canadians on the United Synagogue Youth (USY) Israel summer trips out of a total of 100 North American teens. Before the intifadah, the trips averaged 450 to 460 participants. Last summer there were only two Canadians. On the other hand, not all of USY's Israel programs are running this year, Kochberg said.

"I think there's an unusual sense of pride and honour in going to Israel now," she said. "We do what we can to honour our own delegates going to Israel.

"I think there will be the usual bounce-back when things settle down. During the Gulf War, it was the same thing. There was a lot of doubt and hesitation. I think one of the biggest things we've seen is that people who visit Israel during these tough times come back with a stronger message than any kind of PR we can do."

Last year, however, USY launched two new Europe-based programs which had been under discussion for some time. A spokesperson at the USY's office in New York said the programs weren't introduced specifically as an alternative to Israel, but she said there is a possibility parents will see them that way.

National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY), an Orthodox outreach organization for high school students, is replacing its TJJ (The Jerusalem Journey) program with a similar trip to the West Coast, said Rabbi Glenn Black, NCSY's Toronto-based regional director.

Rabbi Black is concerned for the future of Israel summer trips and about the implications for organizations like his own.

NCSY is running only two programs in Israel this summer – a boys' learning program with two Toronto participants and one for girls with one local participant – but last year there were five such programs.

"We held on as long as we could, but we couldn't pull it off," said Rabbi Black. The boys' program has been moved from outside Israel's so-called Green Line to within its pre-1967 boundaries, for security reasons.

News is better for intensive year-long programs, including NCSY's, which has more than two dozen local participants.

Rabbi Black sounded dejected at the prospect of not being able to send young people to Israel, even as he talked of plans to continue his Jewish outreach in other ways.

"We're not sure where the light at the end of this tunnel's going to be... When you do outreach, you want to introduce Israel as a major piece."

Is he worried? "Absolutely."

Student artists sought for novel project

By LARA RABINOVITCH
Special to The CJN

The curators of an upcoming bookmark display at the 26th annual Jewish Book Fair are currently seeking submissions from university students or young artists.

The Bookmark Project, a part of Flex, Koffler Gallery's art intervention program, will be running in conjunction with the Jewish Book Fair at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre (BJCC) from Nov. 3 to 10.

Curators Andrea Brent and Susan Johnston, fine arts students at York University, have been working on the project since February.

"We encourage bookmarks of unusual materials and shapes, as long as they work as a bookmark... Any material you can possibly dream of: photography, printmaking, textiles, beadwork, whatever," Brent said.

In addition to being displayed at Koffler Gallery during the book fair, selected bookmarks, all original works of art, will be slipped into some books, and dropped into some people's purchases.

Artists will also be handing out their bookmarks randomly during the fair. In this way, "people can find art or be given art when they aren't expecting it, in a form that they aren't expecting," said Brent.

Although they welcome submissions from anyone interested, "we would like the bookmarks to revolve around the themes of literacy, reading, and Judaism," she said.

In addition to adding an artistic element to the book fair, the Bookmark Project will showcase young artists' artwork in a major Toronto gallery during a highly visited event:

"Somebody will go home with something you've made, and your name is going to be on it. They're going to remember you, and your name has been put out," Brent said.

Art intervention "makes people aware of art," she said. "It gets their minds thinking about what art is, and how different everyday objects such as a bookmark can be art."

Other Flex projects have included an artwork series in which handmade bars of soap were inscribed with various messages and placed in washrooms throughout the BJCC.

Those interested in the Bookmark Project are asked to submit slides, detailed drawings or a sample bookmark for consideration.

The curators also need an estimate of how many bookmarks the artist is willing to create (the Koffler Gallery will not be reproducing them).

All bookmarks must be signed original works, and not reproduced mechanically. Selected students and artists will receive an honorarium.

The Koffler Gallery also requires background information on the bookmark, Brent said.

"We want to know what the motivation is behind the bookmark. We would like an artist's statement saying who you are, what your purpose is for doing this project, and what materials you used.

"If you're an aspiring artist, if you're a student, if this is a cause that you care about, if you're interesting in literacy and Jewish history, I would encourage you to get involved in the project; it will be a great experience to you as a beginning artist."

For more information, or to submit your bookmark, e-mail bookmarkpro@hotmail.com.

Winnipeg Holocaust educator 'touched the hearts' of students

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — With Hersh Zentner's death June 11 at age 64 after a long battle with cancer, the Jewish community here lost a pioneer in Holocaust education who was instrumental in bringing the subject to Manitoba schools.

Obituary

Zentner, who was born in Canada to Canadian-born parents, first became interested in Holocaust education after a visit to Auschwitz in 1988. After retiring in the early 1990s for health reasons, the longtime high school teacher threw himself into his new avocation.

In her eulogy, Holocaust survivor and activist Barbara Goszer recalled her first meeting with Zentner at a Holocaust awareness meeting nine years ago.

"At that meeting, he offered us the opportunity of a lifetime: his services as a Holocaust educator," she recalled. "All he asked for was office support staff and survivors to go with him and give personal testimony.

"Hersh's proposal was just what our Holocaust awareness programming needed to bring us on par with other communities in Canada."

Zentner's objective was to teach the Holocaust to the non-Jewish world, Goszer said.

"He felt that the information and survivor stories would help to stem the rise of racism in our schools," she said. "He was the architect of our Holocaust education outreach program and with a quickly-assembled speakers' bureau consisting of survivors and March of the Living students, began its pilgrimage."

She said survivors who accompanied Zentner to schools were mesmerized by him and enchanted by his openness and energy. Teachers and students were also impressed and responded positively.

"Our program took off with the speed of lightning," Goszer said. "Every school clamoured for Hersh's program. In the first year, we were doing four or five presentations a week. We had to slow it down because it was taking a great toll on us."

Barbara Kowall, executive director of the Jewish Heritage Centre, said Zentner "had his own way of presenting the Holocaust.

"Others modelled their presentations after his. He was an inspiration to everyone and touched the hearts of every student and adult he spoke to. We hope to be able to perpetuate his work."

Zentner is survived by his wife Lil, who retired a few years ago after a lengthy career teaching in Winnipeg's Jewish school system, and by daughters Pam and Allie, son-in-law Jason and grandson Jonah.

Suicide bombing shocks visiting Torontonians

Members of a UJA Federation solidarity mission to Israel who were in Jerusalem at the time of last week's bus-bombing said they were shocked and emotionally overwhelmed by the attack.

Emotionally distraught and still in shock, Carol Sterling, vice-chair of UJA Federation's Israel Emergency Campaign 2003, said the attack "puts it all into perspective.

"Israelis do not want to be victimized and simply wish to be comfortable in the State of Israel. People are making great sacrifices and we need to continue to show our support."

The Torontonians were in their hotel room when the suicide bombing occurred Tuesday morning. Many said they were impressed with how Israelis handled themselves after the bombing.

Sterling said Israelis feel the need to go with life as best they can.

"They live in the moment despite the sadness surrounding these events," she said. "You go home at the end of the day and realize how important support for Israel is, both financially and otherwise."

UJA Federation associate campaign director Jeff Springer said "the group is handling it extremely well, despite the fact we are all still in shock."

The mission includes more than 80 Toronto community leaders.

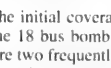
Pernicious misrepresentations

According to Reports



By PAUL MICHAELS

In the initial coverage of the horrific June 18 bus bombing in Gilo, there were two frequently heard misrepresentations that require firm rebuttal.

PA minister Saeb Erekat explained once again that the Palestinian Authority (PA) cannot crack down on suicide bombers because Israel has destroyed its security apparatus. This is nonsense. When the Palestinian forces were intact (as they still are in Gaza), they did little or nothing to stop terrorist attacks. Indeed, PA Chairman Yasser Arafat and elements of the PA have encouraged violence and terrorism.

The second misrepresentation is more pernicious as it concerns the very core of the conflict. In his June 18 report on CBC's The National, Neil Macdonald included comments from Hamas leader Abdul Aziz Rantisi, yet again justifying suicide bombings: "We are under occupation, our holy places are under occupation, so we haven't another choice. We refused occupation and we are struggling now against occupation. So they [the Jews] should leave."

Rantisi means, as explicitly stated in the Hamas charter, that the Jews should leave all of Israel. Instead, Macdonald follows Rantisi's comments with the remark, "But Israelis are in no mood to leave the territories they occupy."

Macdonald is misleading. At a recent foreign correspondents forum, Macdonald was challenged on this very point that journalists do not admit that Hamas wants to see Israel destroyed. He answered: "I've said specifically that Hamas believes that Israel is all occupied territory." But in his June 18 report, Macdonald gives the impression that Rantisi is referring only to the West Bank and Gaza, implying that if only Israelis would leave these areas, Hamas terrorism would end.

We are not quibbling with words here. The distinctions made and the implications drawn from them have profound significance. Macdonald and most seasoned foreign correspondents know that Hamas, Islamic Jihad, Hezbollah, and even elements of Fatah, consider the entire state of Israel "occupied territory." The problem is that they rarely, if ever, convey this to their audiences.

Journalists should clearly state that Islamic extremists refuse to accept the legitimacy of Israel. They seek its destruction and want to replace it with a pan-Islamic state in all of Palestine. The Hamas charter spells it out in several places: "Israel will exist and will continue to exist until Islam will obliterate it, just as it obliterated others before it... [Hamas] strives to raise the banner of Allah over every inch of Palestine." The charter also states that it is Hamas's sacred duty not only to destroy Israel, but also to kill Jews.

Whenever there is movement for peace and reconciliation, Islamic fanatics launch terrorist attacks designed to maim and kill as many civilians, including children, as possible. They then seek to justify their horrific acts by claiming "resistance to occupation." It's a sham, but one that is too often uncritically conveyed by much of the media sympathetic to the "underdog" Palestinians.

Mourning Shani

After hours of searching, her parents went to Abu-Kabir, Israel's national morgue. It took hours and hours to identify the body. Shani must have been standing right in front of the terrorist because a number of tests had to be conducted in order to make sure it was her. I spent yesterday with my former students (many of them having switched schools in the 10th grade). We got together at Mor's house and sat about, waiting.

There were many questions asked and no answers to give. We sat, talked, cried and waited. Cell phones rang constantly, but no news came through. By nighttime, everyone was exhausted by the endless tension and grief. We decided to go home and meet again for the funeral.

I'm now waiting for information about the funeral. It is hard to believe that someone who was such a dynamic, busy, happy part of our lives is no longer. It's hard being the "grown-up," expected to know what to say and how to act, when all you want to do is go into a room and howl, and scream at the world that it isn't fair! Shani was meant to grow up and become a wonderful, contributing member of society. There are no words to describe the grief. Shani Avi-Zedek, yehi zichrah baruch.

Rights group's stance on Israel opposed

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – The termination of Warren Allmand's presidency of the International Centre for Human Rights and Democratic Development (ICHRDD) has exposed a rift between him and a board member over positions Allmand has taken on the Mideast conflict that put most of the blame on Israel.

Winnipeg lawyer David Matas has sent a letter to Foreign Affairs Minister Bill Graham registering his dissent from two public letters Allmand wrote to Graham in April in the name of the ICHRDD.

The first Allmand letter, dated April 2, calls for Canada to pressure Israel to respect international law and withdraw from all territories it has occupied since 1967. Allmand urges intervention by a United Nations peacekeeping force to end the "increasingly horrendous attacks on innocent civilians" by both sides "in quite unequal numbers, we should emphasize."

The second letter, dated April 5, rebukes the government for voting against an investigation of reported human rights abuses in the Middle East.

Only Canada and Guatemala opposed a proposal for UN Human Rights Commissioner Mary Robinson to lead an investigative mission to the region. Allmand wrote Graham that Canada's position was "shameful" and that such a mission "could prove very useful in reducing the tension and exposing the disproportionate use of force by the Israelis."

In an interview, Matas said he hopes the departure of Allmand, a former Liberal MP for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce and Trudeau cabinet minister whose five-year term as president ended May 25, will lead the centre to withdraw these "wildly inappropriate" positions that are rife with inaccuracies and "unfounded accusations" against Israel.

Otherwise, the organization's "credibility" will suffer, said Matas, who is senior legal counsel to B'nai Brith Canada and has served on the ICHRDD board for six years.

"When (the ICHRDD) engages in... a one-sided presentation of the facts, misrepresentation of the law, unsourced allegations, assumption of Israeli bad faith, that is unfortunate for [the organization]. It is also unfortunate for the promotion of human rights in Israel and the search for peace in the region," Matas wrote Graham.

Prime Minister Jean Chrétien did not renew Allmand for another term nor grant him the 18-month extension he had requested. Allmand told The Gazette that he had heard indirectly the Prime Minister's Office was "ticked off" by his criticism of Canada's vote against a UN investigation.

> "Wildly inappropriate" positions that are rife with inaccuracies and "unfounded accusations" against Israel

University of Calgary law professor Kathleen Mahoney, the ICHRDD's chair, has been named acting president until Chrétien appoints a permanent replacement.

Founded in 1988 by the Mulroney government, the Montreal-based ICHRDD is independent and frequently takes positions at odds with government policy, although it has not had as a high a profile in recent years as it did under its first president, former New Democratic Party leader Ed Broadbent.

The centre has been critical of Israel since the beginning of the intifadah.

In October 2000, it criticized alleged Israeli abuses of Palestinian rights, including military attacks on unarmed civilians. It said "hundreds of thousands" of Palestinians "forced into exile" since 1948 should be allowed to return to Israeli-held territory. And last year, Allmand wrote Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, urging him to end the "cruel" economic blockade against Palestinians, and later condemned the expansion of Jewish settlements.

In his April 2 letter, Allmand, 69, said the government should respect its own policy of "non-recognition" of Israeli control and "explicitly ask Israel to withdraw" from the territories, rather than "pressuring "Palestinians to accept the occupation as "legitimate."

Allmand calls the occupation of the West Bank and Gaza the "root cause of the Palestinian crisis" and calls Jewish settlements a violation of the Fourth Geneva Convention and revealing of a policy of colonization. He goes so far as to say that ending the occupation will "lead to a reduction in the level of terrorism worldwide."

He continues:"We have watched in horror the carnage suffered by the Palestinian people in the territories occupied militarily by Israel since 1967 and the destruction of infrastructures... destruction that seems more and more to be a systematic and premeditated policy." Israel, he says, has "exceed[ed] the requirements of military necessity."

He further advises Graham to "resist pressure" by the Israeli and American governments and Canadian "lobby groups" to "exempt" Israel from complying with international law and UN resolutions.

Since Allmand left, Matas has written a 19-page letter to Graham – which Matas has released to The CJN – in which he excoriates statements by Allmand. He calls it "inappropriate" for a human rights organization to make "unsubstantiated, unsourced, unverifiable allegations [against Israel] of human rights violations. Allegations of human rights violations should be grounded in verifiable fact."

Matas terms other "accusations" against Israel as "gratuitous," "false," and "hostile," and is particularly rankled by the reference to "lobby groups," which, Matas said in an interview, appears to mean Jewish organizations.

"The suggestion that there are lobbies to exempt Israel from complying with international law is... unworthy of [the ICHRDD]," Matas wrote Graham.

Matas' letter rejects the symmetry he says Allmand drew between suicide bombings and Israel's defensive actions against such attacks. Matas says the ICHRDD should not be identifying "root causes."

Matas says Allmand is wrong in his interpretation of the Geneva Convention on all counts. "Anti-Zionists use unfounded allegations of human rights violations against the Jews and the Jewish state as war propaganda. [The ICHRDD] should be sensitive to the abuse of the human rights vocabulary to undermine human rights goals.

"Yet, in these letters, [the ICHRDD] has been oblivious to this risk, pouring fuel on an already raging fire."

Matas also takes issue with the prerogative given to the ICHRDD president to make public statements unilaterally, without consulting the board or its chair, if an issue is deemed to require "urgent action." This was the case with these two letters, he said.

Allmand spent a week in Cairo, Jerusalem and Ramallah in January, accompanied by Egyptian-born Rachad Antonius, who previously served as a consultant to foreign affairs.

They explored the possibility of expanding the ICHRDD's interests to the Middle East, for the first time in its history. Traditionally, the ICHRDD has confined its human rights work to Africa, Asia and Latin America.

McGill University history professor Gil Troy said he always felt invulnerable as a member of the post-war generation. "My philosophical world came crashing down... We must respond with facts to all the lies."

Hate, venom and evil are powerful forces, said Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Ottawa's Congregation Machzikei Hadas. It's important to speak out against them, but it's also important to insist to police and government representatives that evil is given "no quarter whatsoever."

IDF increases presence in West Bank

Ha'aretz Daily Newspape Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The political-security cabinet decided last Friday that Israel Defence Forces (IDF) troops will enter Palestinian cities in the West Bank and operate in them for "as long as it is required." The decision also authorized Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to order a future operation in the Gaza Strip.

The cabinet decided in favour both of the expulsion of families of suicide strikers from the West Bank to the Gaza Strip, and of the expulsion of terror operatives from the territories. The implementation of this expulsion policy depends upon the outcome of a legal review.

Another decision authorized the conscription of a reserve brigade slated for activity in the territories under emergency orders. One reserve infantry brigade was called up Sunday.

The language of the decision reached last Friday represented a compromise between a proposal advocated by Sharon calling for IDF presence in the territories for a "prolonged period," and the position upheld by Foreign Minister Shimon Peres and Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer, which called for the IDF action to continue so long as operational considerations warrant it. Sharon eventually embraced formulations promoted by the senior Labor Party ministers.

Top security officials, led by Shin Bet security service director Avi Dichter, said at last Friday's meeting that there is no substitute for IDF presence in centres of terror, and that encircling Palestinian cities does not suffice.

The prime minister spoke about "changing the rules of the game" in the confrontation with the Palestinians. Sharon stressed that the IDF will operate in the territories without any time constraints.

Security sources said Sunday that the IDF operation on the West Bank is likely to last several weeks. IDF troops now occupy parts of Jenin, Nablus, Bitunya (near Ramallah), Bethlehem and Ramallah; IDF forces also have been moving in and out of Tulkarm and Qalqilyah.

Also at Friday's meeting, Minister Yitzhak Levy (National Religious Party) did not vote in favour of the IDF operation. He objected that his party's demand for a more forceful decision calling for the "vanquishing" of terror was not accepted.

After originally voting in favour of the operation, Peres then asked to change his vote when he saw that Levy had abstained; Peres, too, asked to abstain. Ben-Eliezer interjected: "He [Peres] is in favour, he's already voted in favour."

Sources close to Peres subsequently explained that the foreign minister opposed the government decision. All the other ministers supported it.

Ben-Eliezer told the ministers that the IDF will operate intensively anywhere it needs to, on the basis of intelligence information. He said: "We must act in response to a changing reality... No action right now will [completely] stop the terror attacks; we face escalation, and the terror organizations are accelerating their activity. We'll deploy our forces within terror focal points; that's where we'll operate."

The ministers did not discuss the expulsion of Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat. Security officials explained that the expulsion of suicide bombers' families entails legal problems, while expelling terror operatives themselves is less complicated legally.

Minister Without Portfolio David Levy said that Israel is "changing the rules of the game." He explained: "There need not be any limitation on the length of the IDF's presence in [Palestinian] cities. We've already entered them, and we pulled out due to international pressure; and then the terror resumed. We've seen that encircling cities is not enough."

Responding to the government's new expulsion policy, a senior security official said Sunday the "time has come for us to take off our gloves when dealing with suicide strikers."

The source said should terror strikes continue, Arafat could also be deported.

"He's the snake's head, and you can't leave him; it [Arafat's expulsion] is a question of finding the right time," he said.

Justice Minister Meir Sheetrit said Sunday night that the decision to deploy IDF troops in West Bank cities for "as long as is needed" does not violate international law, since Israel has the right to defend its citizens, and prevent terror attacks on its city streets.

In related developments, the United States dismissed Arafat's comments to Ha'aretz that he now accepts the proposal of former U.S. president Bill Clinton for a permanent status agreement between Israel and the Palestinians. Sources in the administration said this plan is no longer on the agenda and there is no significance to such a statement.

The continuing wave of violence in the region that prompted U.S. President George W. Bush to postpone his much anticipated speech on plans for the Middle East has also led to a renewed debate within the administration over the content of the speech and there could now be an even further delay.

According to various reports, the president and his aides are debating the value of advocating an interim Palestinian state in the speech.

According to The New York Times, Vice President Dick Cheney, Defence Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and their close aides have expressed skepticism about proposing anything that could be seen as rewarding Palestinian terrorism.

Quoting sources in the administration, even Secretary of State Colin Powell, who pushed hardest for the plan to be published and for an interim state, has been discouraged and is no longer trying to convince Bush to make the speech as soon as possible. Lawyers and advisers are also reportedly divided over the status of an interim state and what sort of institutions it would have.

It was hoped that Bush would give the speech at the G-8 summit in Canada that opened this Tuesday, but this was looking unlikely at press time.

Speaking in Florida last Friday, Bush was blunt. "If you're talking about the speech," he told reporters, "I'll give the speech when I'm ready to give the speech. But I strongly condemn the series of attacks," he said.

Israel announces new 'land for terror' policy

By LESLIE SUSSER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – Just 36 hours after a bus bombing in southern Jerusalem that killed 19 Israelis – and before another bombing in the northern part of the city killed at least seven – Israeli soldiers were digging in around the Palestinian city of Jenin.

It was obvious they were planning a long stay.

The mobile homes, water pipes and electricity lines the soldiers brought with them were harbingers of a radical new policy.

In recent weeks, the Israel Defence Forces has moved rapidly in and out of Palestinian cities and villages on the basis of pinpoint intelligence.

Following Tuesday's bus bombing, however, the government announced that the IDF will take over large swathes of Palestinian-ruled territory, for relatively long periods of time, in a renewed effort to stop Palestinian terrorism.

Analysis

The move came as U.S. President George W. Bush was putting the finishing touches on a major speech on Middle East policy that was expected to spell out the American vision of a "provisional" Palestinian state whose borders would be defined at a later date. In addition, Bush was expected to send U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell to the region to try to gather momentum toward an international peace conference some time this summer.

The key question is how Israel's new policy will affect any prospects for peace. If Israel indeed seizes Palestinian land, how will that mesh with Bush's anticipated support for a Palestinian state in those areas?

So far, the Americans are showing considerable understanding for the Israeli move.

Even before Tuesday's attack was followed by another bombing Wednesday at a hitchhiking post, the White House had put out a strong statement condemning the outrages and supporting Israel's right to defend itself.

At the same time, however, the Bush administration gently urged Israel "to remember to take into account the consequences of its actions, and keep open the path to peace, the political path."

That, in a nutshell, is the dilemma Israel faces: how to defend its citizens, while retaining international support and not closing the door to peace.

Though Israel has American backing for now, its new policy of holding Palestinian-ruled areas for long periods may soon put it back in the international doghouse.

The idea of seizing land first was mooted several weeks ago by Shin Bet director Avi Dichter, who argued that the Palestinian Authority was not doing anything to fight terror in the areas under its control.

The West Bank is divided into three areas called A, B and C, with Israel responsible for security in Areas B and C. The Palestinians are nominally responsible for A, which is made up of all the Palestinian cities and their immediate surroundings, and includes some 97 per cent of the Palestinian population.

According to the Oslo accords, Israeli forces can move freely in Areas B and C, but are not supposed to enter Area A – except in hot pursuit of suspected terrorists. Dichter, however, says that since the Palestinians are doing nothing about terror attacks coming from Area A, Israel must take charge there to protect Israeli lives.

Last week, Israel began work on a security fence along its former border with the West Bank. But until the fence is built, Dichter told the government, the only effective way to fight terror is to combat it at its source in Area A.

Dichter's plan is not meant to replace the fence but to complement it, especially during the scheduled yearlong construction process. Once the fence is in place, Dichter says, the army won't have to stay in Area A any longer.

The government initially rejected the Dichter plan, but the new wave of suicide bombings and the imperative of saving Israeli lives overcame earlier reservations.

Some may have hoped, too, that the policy would have a deterrent effect, showing Palestinians that each new terror attack would cost them control of additional land.

Cabinet ministers had been concerned about world reaction, expecting to be accused of subverting peace prospects if Israel reoccupies some Palestinian-ruled areas.

They were also worried that Israel might be sucked into a creeping reoccupation of the entire West Bank and Gaza Strip, which would entail responsibility for civilian life for three million Palestinians.

The government wants to avoid this scenario at all costs. Former military governors of the West Bank shudder at the thought of dealing with everyday Palestinian life – from food supplies to health, education and welfare, to town planning and housing permits.

Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer is adamant that Israel has absolutely no intention of reoccupying the entire West Bank and Gaza Strip.

Only the most hawkish members of the cabinet, like National Religious Party leader Efraim Eitam, favour total reoccupation.

But that was not what the cabinet voted for. The idea rather is to hold different parts of Area A at different times without taking on civil functions.

Nevertheless, even this is a radical departure from previous Israeli policy – and, significantly, it was supported by Labor Party members of the cabinet, including party leader Ben-Eliezer.

Goldberg helped bring Canada Centre to northern Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Yossi Goldberg, the Israeli visionary behind the Canada Centre recreation facility and president of the Israel Ice Skating Federation (IISF), died recently after a long battle with cancer. He was 60 years old.

Obituary

Goldberg served for 20 years as mayor of the northern border town of Metulla and one term as a Likud member in the Knesset. He is widely credited with pushing for a Canadian-financed recreation centre in Metulla, one of the more remote areas in Israel.

Yossi Goldberg

The centre, which has two skating rinks, one of which is Olympic size, helped revitalize the region's economy and provided a much-needed recreational outlet for Metulla and nearby communities. It also became the home rink of the nascent Israeli figure skating and hockey programs and helped bring the Israeli winter sports programs onto the international stage. Israel recently won a bronze medal at the World Championships in Japan.

"Yossi was a dynamic, terrific guy," said Dr. Gerald Halbert, former head of UIA Canada, now UIA Federations Canada. "He was the best partner UIA Federations had in Israel. He worked closely with us and his vision put Canada Centre in Metulla when everybody else thought it was crazy."

Judith Javor remembered Goldberg as a "person who set himself goals and was determined to reach those goals and wouldn't take no for an answer."

Javor, who worked with Goldberg as general secretary of the Israel Ice Skating Federation for seven years, said, "Almost everything he did was done to improve conditions in Metulla and life in Metulla... He fervently believed in this area."

Speaking from Israel, Javor said Goldberg, a third generation resident of the town, "actually took Metulla out of the dark ages and put it on the map."

A tireless worker, Goldberg fought hard for government funding for the community. His initiatives led to street paving, lighting systems, public flower boxes and enhanced civic services.

Jeff Budd, who volunteered at the Canada Centre rink from 1993-98, said Goldberg was also a peacemaker. As mayor of Metulla, he was instrumental in opening the Good Fence that divided Israel from Lebanon. Goldberg also found jobs for hundreds of south Lebanese, and he arranged for visits by Lebanese Christian and Muslim youngsters to Israeli schools and the Canada Centre.

"It was genuine. There was a real bond between the peoples," Budd said.

In recent years, Goldberg left civic politics and devoted himself to the skating program. He represented the IISF at the Salt Lake Olympics and the World Championships in Japan.

Goldberg kept news of his illness quiet. He underwent surgery for lung cancer 15 years ago and was battling a recurrence in recent years. In his last days, his breathing was aided by an ever-present oxygen tank, which was by his side when he attended his daughter's wedding only 10 days before he died.

Goldberg is survived by his wife, Dalia, and three children.

Panel approves narrower right of return for Jews

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The ministerial committee on legislation approved a proposed revision to the Law of Return on Sunday. The proposal was backed by four ministers from Shas, and the National Religious Party. Justice Minister Meir Sheetrit opposed the proposed amendment.

The revision, proposed by MK Michael Kleiner (Herut), holds that a person who has a Jewish grandparent can enjoy rights afforded under the Law of Return only if he or she immigrates to Israel together with the grandparent. In a case in which the grandparent is not alive, the grandchild would have to prove they were persecuted due to his or her Jewish ancestry.

Kleiner said Sunday that his proposal aims to reduce as much as possible the number of non-Jews from the former Soviet republics who immigrate to Israel in order to benefit from privileges conferred under the right of return.

Sheetrit said he opposed the bill since the issue it raised was complex and should be discussed thoroughly by the cabinet. He expressed consternation that most of the secular members of the ministerial panel on legislation were absent from the meeting and had not cast ballots on the bill.

Israel halts aid to territories from Iran and Iraq

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel recently decided to stop the flow of aid – food and medicine – from Iran and Iraq to Palestinians in the territories.

During the first months of the conflict in the territories, Iraq and Iran began sending humanitarian assistance to the territories, and Israel did not obstruct it.

Trucks from Iraq delivered humanitarian aid and Iraqi hospitals took in and treated Palestinians wounded by Israeli gunfire. Iraqi President Saddam Hussein's government also supplied financial aid to families of suicide bombers and Palestinian fighters killed in clashes with Israeli troops.

Explaining the decision to ban all forms of aid from Iran and Iraq, a top Israeli security official said "there is no such thing as 'humanitarian aid' from these two countries."

Aid given by them has a wider objective of supporting terror groups, the source said. He said enough aid reaches the territories from other sources – moderate Arab states, the European Union, international organizations – and further shipments from Iran and Iraq are not required.

Parallel with the assistance, both Iran and Iraq have helped to build up terror networks on the West Bank and Gaza Strip, the security official said. Iran was particularly active in this respect, delivering large supplies of firearms, often using Hezbollah as a conduit for this export of weapons to terror organizations in the territories.

In some cases Israel intercepted weapons before they reached terror groups – the capture of the Karine A weapons ship being the best known example.

Israel is also trying to disrupt the transfer of money from Iraq to families of suicide bombers, but it has yet to track down the channels along which these transfers flow.

Documents confiscated by the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) during Operation Defensive Shield show that Palestinian Authority officials paid several visits to Iraq to organize the transfer of donations.

Last March, a delegate from the Iraqi Ba'ath party in the territories told Al-Quds newspaper in an interview that Iraq had until then transferred $12 million (US) to families of fighters who had been killed or wounded.

On at least three occasions this year, Saddam praised suicide bombers and called on Arab states to help smuggle weapons into the territories – anti-tank weapons in particular.

IDF intelligence analysts believe Iraqi support for terrorist activity in the territories has several goals. These include deflecting attention from events in the Gulf, inciting the Arab world against Israel, and deferring possible American action against Saddam.

Women with disabilities celebrate bat mitzvahs

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — "It is a lifetime goal for people with disabilities to know that we can achieve our goals just like our brothers and sisters in the community," Debby Applebaum said in an address to Agudath Israel Synagogue's congregation after reaching a very special milestone.

Applebaum and her friends Shirley Harris and Debbie Waserman recently celebrated their joint bat mitzvah, which is always a special occasion for any young woman.

But the three are no longer teenagers. They are the first group of women to become b'not mitzvah as part of a study program with Cantor Daniel Benlolo through the Tamir Foundation's Judaic outreach programs, designed to help people with developmental and other disabilities learn about, practice and celebrate Jewish life.

In addition to reciting their blessing over the Torah, the women, who had studied with Benlolo for seven months, each gave a dvar Torah.

The Tamir Foundation, founded in 1980, provides residential care for Jewish adults with developmental disabilities.

Zelda Shore, president of the Tamir Foundation's board of directors, congratulated the women and thanked them for "providing us with the privilege of sharing in their accomplishments... There will be others who will celebrate their b'not mitzvah in the future, but you are the first and you are a model for others to come."

Rabbi Arnold Fine, spiritual leader of Agudath Israel Congregation, spoke of both the synagogue's longstanding relationship with Tamir and of his own family's ties.

Because of the proximity of a Tamir group home to the shul, its residents and staff have become a part of the Agudath Israel "family" and have worshipped there for many years, Rabbi Fine said. He recalled that one of his daughters was the first to institute Judaic programming at Tamir and he therefore felt a special closeness to the bat mitzvah celebration.

The current Judaic program co-ordinator, Leah Smith, sat proudly on the bimah as the women recited their blessings and gave their dvar Torahs. Smith and volunteer Gittel Sheffield helped the three women prepare for their big day.

"Many people told me that I would not be able to get a good job or live by myself," said Waserman. "My positive thoughts have allowed me to do things I never thought possible, like getting my own apartment and my fantastic job at Viva Pizza [a kosher pizzeria here]. I have been able to overcome my challenges."

Each woman spoke of performing a special mitzvah as part of their preparations for the big day.

Waserman worked with children at Ganon Preschool, while Applebaum has been visiting a young woman who had a stroke, and Harris, who said she has "always felt close to the elderly," has started making an afghan for the local Jewish seniors' lodge.

After the women were given framed certificates, Tamir executive director Mark Palmer was presented with a program as a record of the event.

REENA DINNER: A Reena Foundation dinner to honour John Bitove Jr., a founding co-owner of the Toronto Raptors and head of Toronto's bid for the 2008 Summer Olympics, was held June 11 at the Sheraton Centre. More than 1,000 people came to honour Bitove's commitment to the foundation's Answering the Challenge campaign in support of a new ElderHome for seniors with developmental disabilities. Hadassah Hospital treats Israeli, Palestinian victims of attacks

A 22-year-old Israeli man who suffered brain damage and lost sight in one eye from a nail-studded bomb blast in Jerusalem's Ben Yehuda pedestrian mall last December, a Palestinian security official needing a bone marrow transplant for his leukemia, and a 12-year old Palestinian boy donating bone marrow to his brother have all been treated at Israel's Hadassah Hospital.

Since September 2000, the Hadassah Medical Center at Ein Karem and Hadassah Hospital at Mount Scopus, both in Jerusalem, have treated 1,700 victims of terrorist attacks – both Israeli and Palestinian.

The hospital provides cutting-edge medical services to Jews and Arabs from across the Middle East, particularly at the Mount Scopus campus, which serves a large percentage of Israeli Arabs and Palestinians.

Obstetrical care, including neonatal intensive care facilities, is offered to Jews and Muslims alike, as are such services as bone marrow transplants and cancer treatments.

But the 19-month-old intifadah has strained the hospitals' facilities to the limit. Although most of the victims treated have been lightly injured, in that their lives or major organs were not considered to be in danger, many suffered burns, broken limbs and severe bruising.

The hospital's emergency trauma services aren't the only ones feeling the strain. Many patients must remain or weeks or months to be fitted with prostheses or to undergo further surgeries.

As well, thousands of terror victims receive post-traumatic stress counselling at the hospital. The psychiatry department recently set up four-person psychiatric emergency response teams, which "immediately intervene with emotionally distressed survivors and their loved ones," according to a release from Canadian Hadassah-WIZO.

Canadian Hadassah-WIZO is the sole representative of Hadassah Hospital in Canada.

Sharing the same humanity at a concert

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

On a day when five Israelis – all civilians – were killed by Palestinian gunmen in the West Bank settlement of Itamar, David Buchbinder and Roula Said were holding hands on a steamy stage.

Buchbinder, the trumpeter of the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band and the former artistic director of the Ashkenaz festival of Yiddish culture, is a Jew. Said, the founder of the Middle Eastern band Maza Meze, is a Palestinian Christian.

They are also married.

On this warm night, at The Great Hall in downtown Toronto, Buchbinder and Said were keeping the troubles of the Arab-Israeli conflict at bay.

Along with their Arab, Jewish and Christian friends, Buchbinder and Said had organized an ecumenical evening of music, poetry and dance. They called it: Imagine the Sound of Peace.

It brought together pianists such as Marilyn Lerner and John Farah, medieval Arabic music authority George Sawa, guitarist Levon Ichkanian and vocalist David Wall.

As they clasped each other's hands, Buchbinder and Said chanted a soft, repetitious Arabic melody.

When they finished, soaking in the waves of applause from an appreciative audience, Buchbinder described the concert – the first of its kind in Toronto– as "a somewhat unusual, wonderful party."

Given the deteriorating situation in Israel and the territories, this was certainly an understatement.

Shortly after Buchbinder spoke, about a half dozen young women in long white dresses walked down the aisle, throwing red flower petals at the musicians and vocalists and then at the men, women and children in the crowd.

It was that kind of a concert, an outpouring of hope piercing the darkness, if only for two fleeting hours.

After Buchbinder and Said had warmed up the audience, Sawa, on 'ud, and Nabil Qtami, on guitar, appeared. Before launching into the number, Sawa, a tall, dignified man, alluded to the deadly struggle that pits Arabs against Jews in the Mideast.

His 'ud, he disclosed, had been made in 1905, "before there was any conflict between us."

The next set piece, written by Nadia Habib, featured, among others, Maryem and Ernie Tollar.

It was an ode to peace in which the phrase, "There is no peace without recognition," was repeated again and again, and during which the words "enough" and "peace" were uttered in English, Hebrew and Arabic.

David Buchbinder and Roula Said

Then, accompanied by Lerner, Buchbinder belted out a sweet, explosive klezmer favourite about the manifold joys of whisky.

The first half of the concert, an unbridled celebration of multiculturalism, set the tone for the second part.

Imagine the Sound of Peace, dedicated to the proposition that Arabs and Jews have lived and can live together in coexistence, will not bring harmony to the fractured Middle East, or stop the suicide bombers who wreak havoc on Israel.

But if nothing else, it showed us that we all share the same humanity.

Guitarist resurrects lively jazz of the past

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

Jazz lovers with a penchant for the past appreciated what Martin Loomer played at this year's Du Maurier Downtown Jazz Festival in Toronto.

As rhythm guitarist and arranger with Jim Galloway and his Wee Big Band, Loomer revives the music of jazz legends such as Duke Ellington, Count Basie and Fletcher Henderson. Although he was not born in the 1930s, the Toronto native feels a need to focus on the classics.

"I'd rather play something really good, something proven to be worthwhile, than create something mediocre," says Loomer, 47.

His 17-piece band recently played at Nathan Phillips Square, where they showcased the timeless tunes that leave the audience tapping their toes.

He also arranges compositions for a 22-piece band called The Canadian Tribute to Glenn Miller, which Loomer has been with its inception in 1990. Loomer is responsible for the band arrangements, often laboriously listening to Miller tunes and transcribing the notes on ledger lines.

When he first heard The Doors and other rock bands in Grade 7, Loomer says, he knew he wanted to be a musician. After graduating from the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), he studied music at York University, where he played in small combos.

Specializing in guitar, he found he was more satisfied writing music than playing it. Since then, Loomer has arranged hundreds of songs for the Galloway band and also works as a music copyist – he writes out the notes for separate instrument parts, a musician's technical support.

He worked for the Charlottetown Festival for 14 years and transcribed music for hundreds of commercials.

"I'm not concerned with being creative," he says. "I like to hear an alto saxophonist twist notes in an old melody, and offer himself to the audience." He adds that he is comfortable playing rhythm guitar, plucking quarter-notes as he watches "the groove cookin' on."

Loomer says that when 1990s jazz shifted to darker moods, he wanted to turn away from that and instil joy into the tunes."It sounds cliché, but I want people to forget their worries."

And Martin is not the only Loomer to be spreading the musical wealth. His brother Marshall is the cantor at Beth David-B'nai Israel-Beth Am Synagogue.

"My brother [Marshall] has raw musical talent," Loomer says. "When we were young, he would sing with the great [late Cantor Mordechai] Herschman on record."

Both brothers have succeeded in a common mission: to resurrect the beautiful music of a time long ago, with respect, energy and flair.

By his own choice, Martin Loomer continues to repeat the past – as long as it's got a swingin' beat.

Film profiles woman's dedication to Third World children

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Montrealer Naomi Bronstein is a Jewish Mother Teresa, having saved the lives of countless orphans from Cambodia to Guatemala.

As one of the founders of Healing the Children and Canada House, organizations that care for abandoned children, she has made a name for herself in international humanitarian circles.

She and her former husband, Herb, also adopted a number of children, forming something of a unique multicultural household.

Judy Jackson's sympathetic profile of Bronstein, A Moment in Time: The United Colours of Bronstein, will be aired by Vision TV on Thursday, July 4 at 9 pm and again at 11 pm.

This one-hour documentary traces Bronstein's dedication to, and involvement in, this just and worthy cause.

The daughter of a garment manufacturer, she had the benefit of a comfortable upbringing. Her mother, Tillie Segal, says she was always thinking of others, even as a child.

At 18, she got married, and she and her husband had three children. In 1969, she broke with conventional norms and went to South Vietnam to work as a volunteer at an orphanage. Then she helped establish Canada House, an adoption agency.

Jackson doesn't bother telling us how her husband felt about her solo trip to Vietnam. Did he support her move? Was he unhappy about it? It's a regrettable omission.

Bronstein was devastated when a group of Vietnamese orphans she had assembled for new lives in North America were killed in an airplane crash soon after takeoff.

"My soul was shattered," she says.

After Vietnam, Bronstein found herself in Cambodia, a nation wracked by civil war. There she formed Canada House. Thanks to her efforts, the Canadian government accepted 65 new-born Cambodian orphans.

In 1976, Bronstein opened a branch of Canada House in Guatemala, then ravaged by civil war. She witnessed severe malnutrition in the divided Central American country that was worse than anything she had seen in Asia.

She described the malnourished children in Guatemala as "walking and crawling cadavers."

Before she left, she formed Healing the Children, which brings children to Canada for life-saving surgery.

By this point, she and Herb had 12 children, five of their own and seven adopted ones. The Bronstein brood, encompassing the colours of the universe, was quite a sight in suburban Montreal.

Bronstein's varied activities must have taken a toll on her marriage. After 33 years, she divorced her husband.

But again, Jackson offers no explanations, leaving us in the dark.

The last minutes of A Moment in Time revolve around the marriage of one of Bronstein's adopted children, her return to Guatemala in 2000 and the reunion – the "mother of all reunions" – she has with the Cambodian orphans, now fully grown.

"Every child has a right to live their life," Bronstein observes as the film closes.

It's a fitting end to a poignant film.

AL WAXMAN COLLECTION AT TORONTO REFERENCE LIBRARY

A collection of original Al Waxman memorabilia, including scripts, scrapbooks, correspondence, clippings and photographs, is now being housed in the Performing Arts Centre of the Toronto Reference Library.

Best known for his television roles in King of Kensington and Cagney & Lacey, the Toronto-based actor died last year of complications following heart surgery.

Waxman first approached the library in 1994, offering his personal collection for archiving. Following his death his widow, Sara Waxman, donated additional materials, including videotapes of his early work, photographs and awards.

"He said he chose the public library because he wanted the collection to be available to everyone since his most popular roles were portrayals of ordinary people," she said.

The Performing Arts Centre is located on the fifth floor of the Toronto Reference Library. For more information, visit the web site www.tpl.toronto.on.ca or call the Answerline, 416-393-7131.

Poker Face focuses on Alex, a man not yet 60, whose worsening memory forces his friends to decide whether he and his wife can continue playing poker with them as they have done weekly for 16 years.

Another Israeli television show, Mother V, competed in the same category, as did films from Finland, Zimbabwe/Tunisia and South Africa. The festival web site is www.banff2002.com

Russian, French films now on video

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

A little known Russian film, We Are Going To America, based on the Sholom Aleichem short story Boy Motl, was recently released on video.

This tragi-comedy tells of the trials and hardships of a Jewish family leaving its Russian shtetl in search of a better life in America.

The voyage is shown through the eyes of 11-year-old Motl and opens symbolically in the shtetl cemetery with the boy yelling out his goodbyes to past generations. Motl is then attacked by a group of local children who hold him down and force some lard into his mouth.

During the trip, Motl meets many people, including an orphan girl, a madwoman and a number of other intriguing and unusual characters.

The film, produced in 1992 and directed by Efim Gribov, is mainly in Russian, with a small sprinkling of Yiddish, and with English subtitles. It is filled with symbolism and mysticism.

One such symbol is the huge bag of belongings wrapped in a sheet that the family takes with it on its trip. The bag is so big that several members of the family must help carry it. It's almost as if the family is trying to bring their way of life and all their traditions with them.

Motl is a curious young boy whose inquisitiveness leads him to explore the train on which they are travelling, where he meets a host of strangers. The director uses reflections in widows and mirrors and steam from the locomotive in order to obtain an otherworldliness effect.

We Are Going To America is a fascinating film. It is available through Facets Video and can be purchased for $29.95 (US) from www.facets.org or by calling 1-773-281-9075.

For those of us who have been waiting impatiently for the French farce The Mad Adventures of Rabbi Jacob to arrive on video, or who saw the film at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival last April and would like to get their own copy, here is some good news. The movie can be purchased at a Web site that specializes in French videos, www.francevision.com. The price is $39.95 (US), plus a shipping charge and is available in the VHS format only. You can also order by calling 1-800-835-7537 or faxing 1-301-656-1658.

Popular Ashkenaz festival returns to Toronto's Harbourfront Centre

The Ashkenaz Festival is returning to Harbourfront Centre, Toronto's acclaimed lakeside cultural venue, for its fourth incarnation. Ashkenaz, both richly traditional and innovative, is the largest festival of its kind in the world. Over 70,000 people attended the last Festival in 1999.

The festival presents productions and works of art created and performed by world-renowned artists from every discipline - music, theatre, dance, film, visual art, literature, and crafts - who are exploring the traditional forms and imaginative possibilities of Eastern European Yiddish/Jewish culture. Ashkenaz features klezmer ensembles, jazz musicians, poets, singers, filmmakers, actors, dancers, storytellers and others, many of whom are premiering their newest works.

Bridging differences within the Jewish community and the community at large, Ashkenaz draws on the wisdom of the past, and the creativity of the present, in order to create and express a living and breathing Yiddish culture.

"The fourth incarnation of Ashkenaz signifies wholeness bringing together all of the elements in order to put our deep diasporic culture in the spotlight," said artistic director Mitchell Leonard Smolkin.

Reel Ashkenaz, the film program of the Festival, returns with two fabulous musical interpretations of the classic Soviet-era silent feature-length comedy, Jewish Luck. Starring the legendary Yiddish actor Simon Mikhoels, the film is an adaptation of the very funny Sholom Aleichem tale, Mendel the Matchmaker. Jewish Luck will be performed live twice during the Festival, once in a jazzy Sephardi approach by pianist Anthony Coleman and secondly, in sophisticated Ashkenaz style, by the Polish Cracow Klezmer Band.

In honour of the Festival, the Miles S. Nadel Jewish Community Centre will present Sing-A-Long to Fiddler on the Roof with host David Gale (Lovin' Spoonful). Cabaret veteran Gale will lead the audience in funny but rousing tributes to such classic songs as Sunrise, Sunset and If I Were a Rich Man.

The screening will take place two days prior to the official Festival opening on August 29 at 8pm on the Harbourfront Centre Concert Stage for $10.

Soccer star represents U.S. at World Cup

By TOM TUGEND
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LOS ANGELES — Soccer star Jeff Agoos was so angry when he was the last player cut from the 1994 U.S. World Cup squad that he threw his uniform into a fireplace and burned it.

"I had gone through two years of grueling training and was very disappointed," said the 34-year-old defender for the San Jose Earthquakes of Major League Soccer (MLS).

Agoos made the World Cup team in 1998 when the United States was eliminated in the first round, but he didn't get to play.

He made the roster again this year and was in the starting lineup when the United States played its first match against Portugal on June 5 in Suwon, South Korea, which the Americans won 3-2.

Unfortunately, Agoos suffered a moderate calf strain during the first half of the USA's 3-1 loss to Poland, and did not play in the the team's World Cup-ending 1-0 loss to Germany. Agoos will be sidelined for approximately 4 to 6 weeks.

With 133 caps – one for each time he has played in an international match – Agoos is second on the USA's all-time cap-winners list behind Cobi Jones, and holds the U.S. record for international starts with 123, including all three group matches during this year's World Cup.

"We are very disappointed for Jeff," said U.S. head coach Bruce Arena. "He has made an outstanding contribution to this team, and we will wish him a speedy recovery."

Born in Geneva, Switzerland, Agoos was raised in a "somewhat religious" home, halfway between Reform and Conservative. "I went once a week to Sunday school and we observed the holidays," he said.

Six months after his birth, his parents moved to South Africa and four years later moved again, this time to the United States, settling first in Atlanta and finally in Dallas.

"I started playing soccer when I was eight years old, along with basketball and other sports, but as I got older, I settled on soccer," said Agoos, whose nickname is "Goose."

He started playing professionally in his last year of college at the University of Virginia, and, after a stint in Germany, began playing U.S. professional soccer in 1996 with D.C. United.

In February 2001, he was traded to the Earthquakes and led the team to its first MLS Cup championship, while winning the MLS Defender of the Year award for himself.

Agoos, who stands 5-10 and weighs 175 pounds, starred on the U.S. team in the 1985 and 1989 Maccabiah Games, both won by the host Israeli team.

He represented the United States again at the 2000 Olympics in Sydney, Australia, where his team placed fourth, the best American showing ever.

In his personal life, Agoos is a bachelor and said that "I'm not as much Jewishly involved as I would like to be, but I observe some of the holidays."

Agoos' younger brother, Brad, is the assistant soccer coach at the University of California at Berkeley.

During his 14-year playing career, Agoos has seen the level of American soccer "improving greatly, with a much better talent pool. We still have some ways to go, but we can now compete with any country in the world."

Bridge with Gitelman

Contract bridge reached its height of popularity in North America in the 1950s thanks to Charles Goren's teaching and marketing skills. Sadly, the game has been in decline ever since, but bridge seems to be undergoing a revival in recent years as retiring baby boomers are taking up the game en masse in an attempt to exercise their minds (it works – try it!).

Perhaps you are one of the many millions of people who learned to play bridge according to Goren's teachings. If you have recently tried to relearn the game you will have noticed that some things have changed – not in terms of the rules of bridge itself, but in the language of "standard bidding methods." The purpose of this column is to describe the three most important changes that have taken place in bridge bidding during the past 40 years or so.

1. The point ranges of notrump opening bids.

Goren taught that a 1NT opening bid should be based on a hand with 16 to 18 high card points (HCP) and that a 2NT opening bid should promise between 22 and 24 HCP. Nowadays, almost all bridge teachers recommend ranges of 15 to 17 HCP for 1NT and 20 to 21 HCP for 2NT.

2. 5-card majors

According to Goren's methods, the proper opening bid with this hand:

♠ 62 ♥ AKJ5 ♦ AQ92 ♣ 854

is 1♥. Today you will find that 1♦ would be the nearly universal choice among bridge authorities in North America. The reason is that, in modern standard bidding methods, at least five cards are required to open the bidding in a major suit. The fact that the heart suit in the above hand is stronger than the diamond suit is irrelevant. As hearts is a major suit, your 21st century partner will expect you to hold at least five hearts if you open the bidding with 1♥.

Astute readers might have already considered that by switching the spades and diamonds of the above hand:

♠ AQ92 ♥ AKJ5 ♦ 62 ♣ 854

There is no longer any satisfactory opening bid using five-card majors. Both 1♠ and 1♥ are out since neither of these (major) suits contain the requisite 5-card length. This hand (with 14 HCP) is not quite strong enough for a 1NT opening and it is certainly too strong to pass. The solution is to open 1♣, despite holding only three low cards in that suit.

You may have heard of this principle described as "the short club," "the convenient club", or "the better minor". Whatever name you choose to call it, the practice of opening 1♣ (and occasionally 1♦) with only three cards in the suit is a necessary evil when playing five-card majors. Still, almost all of today's bridge authorities believe that the benefits of five-card majors are more than enough to make up for the downside of sometimes having to bid a non-suit.

3. Weak two bids

Goren taught that all opening bids of two of a suit described powerful hands. This method is called strong two-bids. In today's bidding methods, 2♣ is used as the only strong opening bid while 2♦, 2♥, and 2♠ are used as weak two-bids. A weak two-bid is used to describe a hand with a strong six-card suit and roughly six to 10 HCP. Here is an example of a hand that is suitable for a weak 2♠ opening bid.

♠ KQJ972 ♥ J4 ♦ 9852 ♣ 10

The 2♣ opening is not only strong, but it is also artificial (meaning that opening 2♣ says nothing about clubs). When your partner opens with a strong 2♣ you cannot pass regardless of how weak your hand is. You have to bid something and the opener will show his long suit on the next round (or bid notrump if his hand is balanced and too strong for a 2NT opening bid).

Fred Gitelman is one of Canada's most successful tournament bridge players. His Las Vegas-based company, Bridge Base Inc., is a world leader in the development of educational software for bridge. Goodbye and good luck ... to me

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

On a personal note, uncharacteristic for me, I have good news and bad – or good news and good news, depending on how you feel I have discharged my duties in this space since 1997. First, this is my last column, although I will be returning as a reporter in the fall. I've been pumped by someone half my age, who will reach out to younger readers. It's an indignity many mid-lifers have suffered.

But the good news, at least for me, should counter feelings of graceless aging: It falls to me to tell you that I'm going back to school.

I've got my backpack, a notebook computer and several pens (the rubberized ones. They provide better grip for my old fingers), as well as a $10,000 (US) scholarship to study religion writing at Northwestern University in Evanston, Ill., just outside Chicago.

The Specialized Reporting Program in Religion, Spirituality and Ethics at Northwestern's Medill School of Journalism is unique and world-famous. It's an intensive, summer-long semester that brings together five graduate students and an equal number of "mid-career journalists" (there's that term again) to sharpen skills and expand horizons. Class size is limited, so it was indeed an honour to be chosen.

This program's mere existence amazes me, and reflects the stature in which religion reporting is regarded in the United States, where virtually every large and medium-sized newspaper has a full-time reporter on the religion beat. This is understandable in a country like the U.S., which wears its faith on its sleeve, and where public figures fairly trip over each other to proclaim who loves God most. President George W. Bush's faith-based initiatives, in which religions are expected to take up slack in social services, would never fly here.

It's a different story in Canada, where religion is regarded as a highly personal issue. In all, there are just four full-time and one-part-time religion/ethics/spirituality reporters at secular media outlets in this country, compared to something like 80 full-time sports writers. I've always hoped that was not a gauge of where our priorities are as a society, but I fear it is.

Why don't the media boost their coverage of religion? Simply, because they don't listen. A poll released four years ago at the inaugural Faith and the Media conference in Ottawa showed that six out of 10 Canadians feel religion is a "very important" or "important" part of their lives. At the same time, 65 per cent of those who attend a house of worship regularly feel the media do a "poor" job of covering faith and religion.

For good reason. Religion, noted media columnist John Fraser once, is one of two great "no-go" areas for the media (the other being universities). He noted there are exceptions, "but as a general rule over the past few decades, stories on religion will break into the media only if they are (a) sensational, (b) bizarre, (c) goofy, (d) gee-whiz, or (e) contemptuous."

Now, one could say those epithets apply to everything the media do, but Fraser had a point. Editors – rationalists as they tend to be – are often skittish when it comes to straight stories about religion, perhaps fearing that coverage of the spiritually uplifting will make their product appear "soft," or worse, favour one faith over another. (Strange how that doesn't apply to politics.)

There is one truism in all this: Jews receive coverage well out of proportion to their numbers. That probably won't surprise readers of this space.

Which brings me to: Goodbye. It's been a good ride. Some of you liked what I did; some didn't, and said so. Either way, I still feel the greatest privilege is being read.

Epi on Education

Seymour Epstein

In education, as in the world of fashion, we are constantly challenged (some would say threatened) by the latest fad or trend. After a long bout of "values clarification," one of my favourite professors joked at a conference that clarifying one's values was not a desired virtue. He vowed, there and then, to start a new movement called "values obfuscation!"

The back-to-basics trend has been revived every time some new round of testing reveals deep ignorance in a significant sector of the young population. Recently, we heard that back-to-basics is responsible for the lack of daily physical education in elementary schools, a curricular sine qua non of another period. Suddenly, people are discovering that a sound mind and a sound body are one.

Jewish education has also swung from one extreme to another. Each new technique demonized the preceding method and promised salvation. A story from my Joint Distribution Committee (JDC) past in North Africa illustrates the folly in reacting too quickly to trends. It also demonstrates the value of respecting ancient Jewish models before rushing to change. Before I am branded a reactionary conservative, let me tell you the story.

When I arrived in Casablanca in 1981 as the JDC's pedagogic consultant, the visiting Chabad representative for France and North Africa, Rabbi Benjamin Gorodetsky, zichrono li'vrachah, told me a story about his introduction to the region in the early '50s.

On his first visit to the island of Djerba (one of the oldest extant Jewish communities, off the coast of Tunisia, near Libya), he met with the head of a boys' school. He noticed that the children were not in age-segregated classes, and explained that in the west (He was referring to Lubavitch schools in 1950s Brooklyn!), children were taught in classes organized by age. He then moved the children into such an arrangement. The local rav was very impressed, but insisted on moving several children back into the original order. When Rabbi Gorodetsky argued, the Djerban respectfully explained that this particular Yosef had to be with this teacher, Moshe, while this other Yitzchak must study under the tutelage of a certain Messod. Why? Because Yosef's father studied with Moshe's father and Messod's grandfather was the teacher of Yitzchak's grandfather.

Rabbi Gorodetsky looked at me in that Casablanca hotel room, and with a twinkle in his eye, said, "You know, maybe they knew better!"

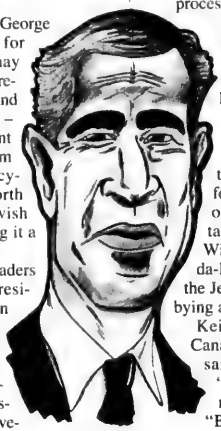
Jewish groups back Bush

Canadian government response inconsistent

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

U.S. President George W. Bush's plan for Mideast peace may be getting critical reviews in Europe and the Arab world – and an inconsistent response from Canadian policy-makers – but North American Jewish leaders are giving it a five-star rating.

Community leaders applauded the president's call for an end to terrorism, a change in Palestinian leadership and the democratization of the Palestinian national movement.



George W. Bush

They urged the Palestinians to act on Bush's offer of financial aid and a provisional Palestinian state within three years of the start of a democratization process.

"If the Palestinians are able to seize the moment, get rid of the present leadership and have free and fair elections, Bush is promising whatever it takes financially to put the Palestinian Authority on its feet. It's a very attractive offer that is there for the taking" said Joseph Wilder, chair of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), the Jewish community's lobbying arm on Israel.

Keith Landy, president of Canadian Jewish Congress, said Bush has set out a "road map" to a peaceful resolution of the conflict. "Bush is calling for accountability, transparency and for a change in leadership," all before Israel is asked to do anything, he said.

B'nai Brith Canada called the president's address "a realistic assessment of Arafat's rule, which has allowed terrorism to thrive and corruption to flourish."

Frank Dimant, executive vice-president of B'nai Brith, urged the Canadian government to back Bush's call for an end to Arafat's rule and to line up behind the United States as part of a global coalition against terror.

Jean Chrétien

At the Kananaskis meeting of G8 leaders, Prime Minister Jean Chrétien see-sawed in his response to Bush's proposal. With Bush sitting at his side, the prime minister said "it might be a good thing" if Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat was replaced. Later he modified his remarks and brought them into line with earlier comments by Foreign Minister Bill Graham: "It's got to be up to the people of Palestine who will decide who will be the leader. It's premature for me to decide who will be the leader. We have to wait for the elections," Chrétien said.

Jacques Chirac, the president of France, adopted a similar position: "With regard to the head of the Palestinian Authority, it is naturally for the Palestinian people and them alone to choose their leaders," he said.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair, meanwhile, lent Bush support. Mideast peace talks require people "we can negotiate with, who are serious about negotiating around the issues of security and political reform necessary for the peace process to work," he said.

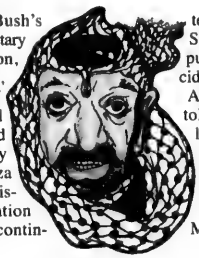
Israeli evidence influenced speech

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israeli intelligence information linking Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat to a $20,000 (US) payment to the Fatah-affiliated Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigades terrorist organization convinced U.S. President George W. Bush to emphasize the need for new Palestinian leadership before Washington supports an independent Palestinian state.

The incriminating evidence was brought to the White House the Thursday before Bush's speech by Israel's military attaché in Washington, Col. Shlomo Mofaz, brother of Chief of Staff Lt.-Gen. Shaul Mofaz, who delivered it to National Security Adviser Condoleezza Rice. The recently discovered information showed that Arafat continued providing financial support to terrorist groups after Operation Defensive Shield and after having publicly denounced suicide bombings.



Yasser Arafat

[Drawings by Michael Nisimov]

Administration officials told the New York Times last week that the information convinced Bush to include a call for new Palestinian leadership.

Israeli Housing Minister Natan Sharansky, a longtime proponent of requiring Palestinian democracy as a precondition for peace negotiations, was in Washington recently to meet with U.S. Vice-President Richard Cheney and Deputy Defence Secretary Paul Wolfowitz, the leading hawk in the Pentagon and one of Israel's most vocal allies in the administration. Wolfowitz said the intelligence information was crucial – "not that we needed much persuasion."

The Bush speech went through 24 drafts before being finalized the day it was given.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Stiffer Term Sought

EDMONTON — The Crown is appealing the one-year jail sentence given to Yousef Sandouga for firebombing the Beth Shalom Synagogue here in October 2000. Sandouga, who pleaded guilty to one count of arson for throwing the Molotov cocktail, told police he wanted to attack the Jewish community because of his rage against Israel. Sandouga was sentenced after co-operating with police and making voluntary restitution of $1,150 for the minor damage caused. Stephen Scheinberg, chair of B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights, lauded the Crown's move, saying: "Differences of opinion or even anger over events in the Middle East do not excuse acts of virulent anti-Semitism."

Bombing Unsolved

QUEBEC CITY — Police here are still waiting for forensic tests on bomb fragments from the May 19 pipe-bombing of Beth Israel Ohev Shalom Synagogue and have made little progress in the case, a spokesperson said. Shortly after the early morning incident, which caused minor damage, police detained a man in the vicinity heard making anti-Semitic remarks, but he was released for lack of evidence. Police have since increased patrols near the shul, its president said.

ISRAEL

PR Fund Empty

JERUSALEM — The $8.3 million (US) public relations budget for Israel's Foreign Ministry has run out, Deputy Foreign Minister Michael Melchior said last week. He said budget cuts have harmed efforts by Israeli representatives abroad to explain government policies and improve the country's image.

Treasurer Ousted

JERUSALEM — The treasurer of the Jewish Agency for Israel, Chaim Chesler, was ousted by the agency's board of governors after he made controversial remarks at the recently concluded 34th World Zionist Congress. Chesler said he prefers an immigrant from the former Soviet Union who might not be Jewish according to Jewish law than "someone who prays three times a day but stays in Brooklyn."

Rate Hiked Again

JERUSALEM — The governor of the Bank of Israel hiked interest rates by two per cent last week, the third hike in a month. The move aimed to restore confidence in the economy and stability in currency markets amid continuing devaluation of the shekel.

WORLD

Sharon Trial Rejected

BRUSSELS — A Belgian appeals court ruled last week against trying Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon for alleged war crimes, saying a defendant needs to be in Belgium for a case to proceed. The ruling dealt with lawsuits filed by Palestinians and Lebanese accusing Sharon of responsibility for the 1982 Sabra and Shatila massacre in Lebanon, carried out by Lebanese Christian militias allied with Israel. Belgian law enables Belgian courts to judge atrocities committed elsewhere, whether or not they involved Belgians. The ruling may still be appealed to Belgium's supreme court.

Attack Warning

NEW YORK — U.S. Jewish organizations heightened security last week after the FBI warned there is a "significant risk" of attacks against Jewish schools and synagogues. The advisory is not for a specific date, time or city. It also warns police to watch for terrorists who may be planning to use fuel tankers in their attacks.

Al Qaeda Admission

DOHA, Qatar — A spokesperson for the Al Qaeda terror group claimed responsibility last week for the April explosion of a gas truck outside a synagogue in Djerba, Tunisia, that killed 19 people, including 14 German tourists. Sulaiman Abu Ghaith made the claim in an interview with the Arabic satellite news channel Al Jazeera.

Flight Delayed

CAPE CANAVERAL — The 16-day flight of Israel's first astronaut, Ilan Ramon, aboard the NASA space shuttle Columbia has been delayed while engineers probe the cause of small cracks in other shuttles' propulsion systems. Columbia's crew had been slated to blast off July 19.

Montrealer Honoured

PARIS — The French government recently named Montreal author Naim Kattan a Chevalier de la Légion d'honneur, one of its highest honours. In announcing the award, President Jacques Chirac thanked Kattan for his cultural contributions to France and La Francophonie. Born in Baghdad in 1928, Kattan has been writing in Canada for more than 40 years.

CNN News Chief Denies Anti-Israel Bias

JERUSALEM — CNN's chief news executive denied claims of an anti-Israel bias in the network's coverage of the Middle East last week during a trip to the Jewish state.

The network dispatched Eason Jordan to Israel amid threats from cable and satellite television companies to cease broadcasting CNN because of its alleged bias. Jordan said the network seeks to provide fair and balanced coverage, though he admitted that some mistakes had been made. Among them, he said, was the decision to give air time to the families of Palestinian suicide bombers.

CNN was due to begin airing a special series on Israeli victims of terrorism last week. Promos for the series appeared in Israeli newspapers.

The public relations offensive follows a recent apology by Ted Turner, CNN's founder, for saying both Israel and the Palestinians are engaging in terrorism.

School board to adopt policy on teaching sensitive issues

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

A recent meeting between Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, and the Toronto District School Board (TDSB) about how to handle sensitive and controversial subjects in the classroom ended on a positive note, says the chair of CJC's community relations committee.

"We are confident that the board fully understands what the challenges are in dealing with such issues as the Arab-Israeli conflict," said Frank Bialystok, an adjunct professor of history at the University of Waterloo.

The meeting came after recent reports that teachers in some Toronto schools were presenting curriculum on Mideast events that Congress and some parents complained was biased against Israel.

Gerry Connelly, associate director of the TDSB, said she is finalizing a policy on teaching controversial issues and will take it to the board in August. "We plan on asking major community groups such as CJC for their input."

She said the board intends to work with administrators and new teachers this summer, and will offer professional development sessions to staff on the new policy.

The board has also developed resource material and sample issues, she said.

"We need to be sensitive to students and to the community, and make sure all [educational] material is balanced and factual. Our concern is about teachers using non-factual material, or teaching lessons that are not age appropriate or are from only one perspective. We realize that with the large diversity of students, issues can be quite complex.

"We have spoken to teachers and administrators and we have agreed to try and ensure that no inappropriate lessons and material are being taught. If something does come to the attention of CJC, however, they will contact me immediately. Our strategy is to be proactive," she said.

Bialystok said that he has faith in the board that it will do all it can to implement the policy.

"They have reviewed old documents, some of which, coincidentally, I had helped draft when I was a high school teacher with the board."

He said, however, that the board has "real money problems" and this could affect how it implements the policy.

"It does not even have the basics to keep up with infrastructure such as buildings and staffing, but it is [dedicated to dealing with sensitive issues] and [representatives] at the meeting seemed quite receptive. They are also open to working with us; they want our input," said Bialystok.

The big issue, he said, is not forming a policy about teaching sensitive issues, but how the board is going to engage in professional development with the teachers.

"The board needs to know how it will deal with an issue such as the Arab-Israeli conflict, whether it is brought into the classroom by a teacher or by a student.

"Teachers need sufficient ammunition to deal with all issues. A policy can be in place, but teachers need to implement it."

He said CJC offered to help the board execute the policy and "they were open to that."

Culture of hate

From the editor desk

The photo that accompanies this column was found by an Israeli army patrol last week in a home in Hebron. It is grotesque, shocking and frightening.

A young infant, not more than six-to-eight months old, is dressed in the macabre uniform of a suicide murderer, replete with a mock explosives belt, a bandalero of bullets across the baby's shoulders and a religious inscription on a forehead bandana.

Stomach-wrenching and stomach-turning, it encapsulates in the most explicit way, the horrible distancing between right and wrong that seems to have taken root in Yasser Arafat's Palestinian society.

An affront to our sensibilities, the content of the photo violates at least two key values that help form the foundation of our western way of life: the sanctity of life and the innocence of our young children.

The family of the baby said the costume was nothing more than a "joke," intended no doubt as a tickling memento for posterity in a family album or perhaps a playgroup point of pride.

In truth, though, it is both an indictment of jarring persuasiveness and a blood-red warning: the moral compass of Palestinian society is dysfunctional.

Rabbi Abraham Cooper, associate dean of the Simon Wiesenthal Center in Los Angeles, points out elsewhere in this issue that "under Yasser Arafat, Palestinian children are indoctrinated from a young age to hate and kill Israelis." He cites, for example, a Hamas Web site that recently "celebrated" kindergarten graduation by parading five-year-olds in military fatigues carrying plastic guns and that re-enacted the Ramallah lynching in which a mob tore apart two Israeli reservists and reveled in dipping their hands in the murdered Israelis' blood.

Each day the evidence mounts of this deadly transmogrification of Palestinian society.

The Wall Street Journal recently recorded the following item. "This is the best day of my life," said Naima al Obeid, in a home video with her 19-year-old son Mahmoud that was made just before Mahmoud left for, and was killed on, a suicide murder mission against Israeli soldiers. "God willing," Naima implored of her son, "you will become a martyr and you will be successful."

In the New York Times, a week later, James Bennet wrote a story about the rash of new suicide bombers, young and secular, "rising up" with increasing frequency from within Palestinian society.

The results of a poll conducted by the Palestinian Jerusalem Media and Communication Centre at the end of May showed that 68 per cent of the individuals questioned either "strongly support" or "somewhat" support suicide bombing operations against Israeli civilians.

It is thus a statement of the anguished and painful fact that the increasing resort by the Palestinians to violence against Israelis is a direct outcropping of the poisonous "culture of hate," as MP Irwin Cotler calls it, that Arafat has cultivated.

Cotler recently spoke about that culture of hate at a meeting of the American Jewish Press Association in Chicago. It is a message he has delivered to countless audiences ever since the UN-sponsored Durban conference against hatred nearly one year ago.

Cotler points out that Palestinian society under Arafat is like a fetid hot-house in which all manner of anti-Semitism and violent acts against Israel and Jews are encouraged and flourish. He refers to the phenomenon of the suicide bomber as a form of genocidal anti-Semitism, responding to the public call by Palestinian leaders to "destroy Israel and the Jewish people."

Genocidal anti-Semitism, Cotler suggests, is the most virulent and lethal expression of a new, escalating, global anti-Semitism. The outrages committed by Islamist and secular Muslim terrorists against the people of Israel are of a piece with the terrorism aimed at the western world and the many, diverse outposts of western culture – of which Israel is the most irritating to pan-Islamic and other Arab radicals – throughout the world.

The suicide bombers, anarchists and thugs whom Arafat let loose upon Israel after September 2000, and has increasingly relied upon ever since, are fellow travellers with the militant radical forces such as Al Qaeda and even nation states such as Iran, Iraq and Syria, who plot against the West. They are tied together philosophically, operationally and financially.

U.S. President George W. Bush understands this linkage and that is why he has finally decided to speak truth to Arafat's chimerical power.

The image of the "infant-bomber" is heartbreaking and terrifying, yet also, alas, more proof that the society Arafat has built for his people is a danger to Israel, the West and ultimately to itself.

Russia undergoing major changes, says rabbi

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Berel Lazar's schedule didn't allow for too much time to meet the public on his recent visit to Canada. The Russian republic's chief rabbi had been booked at two community events during his one-day stop in Toronto: in the afternoon, he was to speak to a small group of business and community leaders; in the evening, he was scheduled to address a broader community gathering.

Unfortunately, the rabbi was forced to cancel the evening affair due to pressing business back home. In an unexpected development, but one which is no longer a rarity, he was invited to the Russian autonomous republic of Bashkortostan by its president, Murtaza Rakhimov, to receive the return of a building that will be turned into a Jewish school, as well as a parcel of land for a new community centre.

The invitation was unexpected because Bashkortostan, situated in the Ural Mountains, is mostly Muslim and because Rakhimov had been resisting the Jewish community's requests to return its communal property. But pressure from Russian president Vladimir Putin changed Rakhimov's mind.

A few months before, Gov. Konstantin Titov of the Samara Oblast had done something similar. He returned to the local Jewish community a decrepit old bakery that prior to the Communist revolution had been an elegant synagogue. Titov had told reporters that the government would join with the Jewish community in rebuilding the house of worship, rejecting reporters' suggestions that the regional government should first address other priorities.

For Rabbi Lazar, the incidents are good news. They illustrate the dawn of a new Russia, one which is much friendlier to Jews and which has abandoned the state-sponsored anti-Semitism of the past.

At a luncheon hosted by Canadian businessman Nathan Jacobson and the Jewish Russian Community Centre (JRCC), Rabbi Lazar said Putin deserves much of the credit for the improvement in attitudes towards the country's Jews. Putin attended the opening of a seven-storey community centre in Moscow, he invited several Russian rabbis to the Kremlin just before Passover and he has pushed for the return of community property that had been seized by the Communists.

Rabbi Berel Lazar

"He has spoken out against anti-Semitism more than once," Rabbi Lazar said. While much of Europe has seen an explosion of attacks against Jews, "Russia has been an incredible exception."

That's a dramatic shift from the Yeltsin era, when the community's entreaties to end public anti-Semitism "fell on deaf ears."

Rabbi Lazar suggested divine providence may have played a role in recent developments. As a boy in St. Petersburg, Putin grew up in a communal apartment with Jewish neighbours. He was practically raised by a neighbouring couple, who fed him and took care of him when his parents were away earning a living.

Not only has the Russian leader become a connoisseur of gefilte fish, he came to appreciate the tranquility and peace of the family's home. Perhaps God put the young Putin there with an eye on the future, Rabbi Lazar said.

Rabbi Lazar believes the changes Putin introduced are irreversible. The Jewish community will not be expected to give up the properties it has received, and what's more, society as a whole is changing. Other important decision makers, including mayors and governors, have changed their attitudes to Jews and a human rights culture is evolving in Russia. Even Israel, vilified in the past by official sources, is getting support in its conflict with the Palestinians, the rabbi said.

A recent incident illustrates the changes in Russian society, Rabbi Lazar said.

A gentile woman driving near Moscow on the road to Kiev was confronted by a sign that said, "Death to the Jews." When she stopped her car and attempted to pull the sign out of the ground, she triggered a bomb explosion that blinded her. The Jewish community responded by flying the woman to Israel's Tel Hashomer hospital for eye surgery. The operation was successful and the woman has regained her vision, said Rabbi Lazar, who accompanied her on her trip to Israel.

The changes in Russia, along with growing confidence in the country's economic prospects, have led to a dramatic drop in aliyah, which he predicted "won't pass the 40,000 level" this year.

At the same time, the Lubavitch movement, of which Rabbi Lazar is a representative, continues to develop Jewish life across Russia. In recent years, the country has seen a rapid growth in synagogues, weekend and day schools, summer camps, soup kitchens and other programs to serve the community. People who hid their Jewish heritage are now proudly identifying themselves as Jews.

"They don't feel they're second class citizens any more," Rabbi Lazar said.

Monthly paper to serve Russian community

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

July 1 is a pretty auspicious day for a birthday in Canada and so what could be more Canadian than to date a publication's premiere issue on Canada Day.

Approximately 5,000 homes in and around Toronto were recently treated to the first issue of Exodus, an English-language magazine aimed at Russian Jews and those with an interest in the Russian community.

Published by the Jewish Russian Community Centre (JRCC), the paper the periodical will cover current events, international news and "areas of Jewish interest, Jewish thought," said Izzy Greenberg, the paper's editor.

"It will be a hip take on Jewish community magazines, but keeping within the boundaries of the rebbe's vision... We want to be hip, we want to be cool, but we want to be traditional."

The rebbe Greenberg was referring to is Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneersohn, the late spiritual leader of the Lubavitch movement.

The rebbe, when he was alive, advocated a program of outreach to Jews around the world.

Greenberg said Toronto is home to a substantial number of Russian Jews who no longer speak Russian but who want to remain connected to that community. Given Russians' penchant for intellectual exchanges, the paper will be "somewhat highbrow, somewhat intellectual, but [we will] keep it warm and not make it into a kitschy kind of community paper," Greenberg said.

Although he has no previous editing experience, Greenberg believes he can deliver a formula that will attract local Russian Jews.

"These people are not being reached" and are not particularly connected to the Jewish community, he said.

"Nothing is attracting them and we want to reach out to them."

In addition to its coverage of Israeli news and other contemporary events, the paper will offer a column on women's spirituality, viewpoints of local rabbis, articles by Internet columnist Joseph Farah and reports from Arutz 7, an Israeli news service.

Greenberg, a graduate of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, will remain the only full-time staffer for now, with most articles submitted by freelancers and news services. The targeted audience of 5,000 was obtained from the JRCC's mailing list of English-speaking Russian emigres.

Conservative, Reform shuls unite for study mission to Jerusalem

Two Toronto synagogues, one Conservative and one Reform, are providing members of the Jewish community with a new reason to visit Israel by collaborating on a study mission to Jerusalem.

The trip, from July 5 to July 11, is being conducted in conjunction with Jerusalem's Shalom Hartman Institute, which promotes understanding and tolerance among all segments of Israeli society. Both Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, the spiritual leader of Beth Tzedec Congregation, and Rabbi John Moscowitz of Holy Blossom Temple, the two organizing rabbis, have studied at the institute.

Designed to promote tolerance

The program consists of four-and-a-half study hours each morning, which includes both seminars and small group learning, followed by a free afternoon, another hour-and-a-half of studying, and dinner. Evenings will offer programs in which political figures, journalists, and others will speak and encourage discussions with mission participants.

Rabbi Moscowitz, who has participated in many similar projects, feels that study missions serve to strengthen bonds with Israel in ways that traditional trips cannot.

"The more depth, the more learning," he says, "[and] the more learning, the more attachment."

Although Rabbi Frydman-Kohl has never organized such an undertaking, he sees the mission as an opportunity for congregants to broaden their minds and to bridge the generation gap.

The project, he says, "promises to be intellectually exciting as well as an opportunity for people of all ages to learn together." The twenty congregants participating range in age from their late 30s into their 60s.

The mission marks the first time the two synagogues have collaborated on such a project and Rabbi Frydman-Kohl hopes this trip will be a model for future journeys that "also reach into the Orthodox community."

Life of rabbinic scholar examined at Kelman lecture

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

When the funeral procession for the great scholar Rabbi Yechiel Yaakov Weinberg was ready to set out for his burial, escorted by his followers and disciples, it was waylaid by a delegation from his former yeshiva, insisting that only they had the right to bury him.

That proponents of modern Orthodoxy and those of the yeshiva world could both claim the same person as their own, is dramatic evidence of the uniqueness of Rabbi Weinberg, says historian Marc Shapiro, holder of the Harry and Jeanette Weinberg chair in Judaic studies at the University of Scranton.

He was presenting the third annual Ruth Kelman memorial lecture, held at Beth Jacob V'Anshe Drildz congregation.

Shapiro's doctoral thesis at Harvard University has been published as a book, Between the Yeshiva World and Modern Orthodoxy: the life and works of Rabbi Jehiel Jacob Weinberg.

Shapiro said Rabbi Weinberg, who lived from 1884 to1966, was educated at prominent yeshivot in Poland, including the Mir yeshiva. He was considered a brilliant student and scholar.

However, to the concern of his teachers, he became attracted to literature of the Haskalah, the Enlightenment. This was at a time when there was no middle path, Shapiro said. "You had to choose either the [world of] the Haskalah or the [world of] the yeshiva."

Perhaps to "save" Rabbi Weinberg, Shapiro posited, his rosh yeshiva arranged a shidduch for him, with the daughter of a rabbi who had just passed away, leaving a vacant position. Unfortunately, he added, she had been educated, or rather not educated, to be only a housewife, and in no way an intellectual partner.

Rabbi Weinberg was miserable. Stranded in Germany by the outbreak of World War I, he elected to stay there even after Russia made peace with Germany in 1917.

He became fascinated by German Orthodoxy, with its belief in Torah im derech eretz, the merger and legitimacy of Torah and secular knowledge, Shapiro said. Although Rabbi Weinberg acknowledged in his writings that this philosophy would not be acceptable in the yeshiva world of eastern Europe, nevertheless he himself supported that stance.

Returning to Russia only to divorce his wife (he never remarried, although she did), he went back to Germany, earned a doctorate at the University of Berlin and became a respected and authoritative halachic authority.

He survived the Nazis, and after the war, moved to Switzerland, where he retired to private life.

As a private citizen, he was free to expound his intellectual beliefs. Shapiro noted that "he knew the sociological realities. If he had remained in Germany, he would have had to make a choice between the yeshiva world and what might be called modern Orthodoxy."

However, he felt that because he had friends in both camps, Shapiro said, "he would be especially acceptable to decide on issues with sociological ramifications."

He believed that in order to make proper halachic decisions, Shapiro said, a rabbi must know and understand the modern world and modern realities. For example, Shapiro said, Rabbi Weinberg ruled that even though the idea comes from Christian confirmation, bat mitzvah is acceptable for young girls. "Not everything that comes from [non-Jews] is forbidden," he noted.

His rationale, said Shapiro, was that not to allow the bat mitzvah would be discrimination.

However, he agreed with Rabbi Moshe Feinstein, an American halachic sage, that the bat mitzvah should be held in a house, rather than a shul.

It's interesting, Shapiro said wryly, that that part of the ruling is ignored today.

In the past, rabbis would look hard for leniencies when ruling on Halachah. A classic example is a poor woman bringing a chicken to a rabbi to determine if it was kosher or not. To rule it unkosher and thus unusable would have been a considerable financial hardship, and the rabbi would try desperately to find a way to rule in her favour.

Shapiro said Rabbi Weinberg did not regard his views as applicable to all groups for all time. A ruling for the United States might not be valid for B'nai Brak, a haredi area of Jerusalem, for instance.

His emphasis was on "bringing Torah to the modern world," Shapiro said. He asserted that decisions "have to be made in terms of modern sensibilities." Slavery, for instance, was allowed in the Torah, but now is unacceptable.

Rabbi Weinberg opposed the use of "halachic tricks," said Shapiro, such as dealing with the shmittah year, when Jews are forbidden to farm in Israel, by symbolically selling the land to non-Jews. "We don't build a state [Israel] on legal tricks. It shows the non-religious that we don't value Torah."

Rabbi Weinberg considered it "immoral" to believe that one does not have the obligation to save gentile lives on Shabbat, but "only someone who lives in the real world can understand the moral conflicts." Many problems facing the Jewish people could be solved if only halachic authorities would have the courage to use lenient and minority opinions, Rabbi Weinberg believed. Sadly, the rabbi acknowledged that he did not have that strength either, Shapiro concluded.

Honesty and the courage to express it

History may very well record the speech last week by U.S. President George W. Bush in the White House Rose Garden as a watershed in the raging, bloody torrent that is the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. It will certainly record it as a remarkably bold statement of foreign policy and inner conviction.

The United States will fully support the establishment of an independent state of Palestine, the president said, but only if it includes "new leaders, new institutions and new security arrangements." In particular, Bush emphasized, to the stunned surprise of virtually the entire world, that the Palestinian people must elect "new leaders not compromised by terror," if they want U.S. backing in their march toward national and political independence. Although Bush did not specifically refer to Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat by name, there was absolutely no ambiguity and no doubt that Bush wants Arafat to step down and away.

Bush called upon the Palestinian people to undertake sweeping reforms of their method of self-governance, the most important of which would be to reject the continued involvement of Arafat in running Palestinian affairs.

Not surprisingly, reaction to Bush's plea to the Palestinian people has been mixed. Supporters of the Arafat regime dislike its forthright bluntness. But their chief criticism of the president's message is disingenuous. They accuse Bush of trying to "dictate" who the Palestinian leader should be, of not allowing Palestinians the right to choose their own leader. These accusations, however, are false.

Bush chose his words carefully and deliberately. Palestinians, of course, have the right and the obligation to choose their own leaders – although to date, neither they nor any of the people in any of the Arab states in the region have ever had the true opportunity to do so. But they – the Palestinian people – should know that the American government has the equal right to choose with which foreign leaders it will enter into relations and conduct affairs of state. And in his speech, Bush explicitly said his government will no longer countenance Arafat as a partner with whom to enter into bilateral, or any other, relations. That is because, by his brazenly duplicitous and lying behaviour, Arafat has placed himself too far outside the norms of conduct that Bush can personally accept.

Bush is to be commended for his radically honest assessment of Arafat and for the courage to express it. Other western leaders, including our own here in Canada, have tended to ignore Arafat's planning and direction of the terror against Israel, preferring instead to recoil into craven, obsequious rationalizations. Though the Palestinian people are deserving and needy of their own state, the American people will not help them achieve it as long as Arafat leads them.

That was the bold, historic and laudable gravamen of Bush's remarkable speech last week.

Help needed for small communities

I have heard that small Jewish communities are in need of competent Torah readers. We hear a lot about the need to preserve our heritage. This would be a good place to start. Could not the Jewish community, through its major organizations, pay for students to visit these communities to help out so that our traditions do not become diluted?

This would be a job for competent people with a knowledge of correct trop rather than well-meaning, but unskilled individuals who do not have this knowledge.

Readers react to the CLC resolution

Regarding "CLC criticizes Israel" (CJN, June 20), I have been a union member since the 1950s and my father was in the printers' union as far back as the 1920s. We have seen great union leaders who supported freedom and opposed totalitarianism, but there was another breed who supported fascism, National Socialism, Soviet socialism and gangsterism. It saddened me to learn that the Canadian Labor Congress (CLC) slammed Israel – the only country in the Middle East that has a free trade union movement. The 23 members of the Arab League do not permit unions to organize, strike and freely pursue better conditions for working people. Indeed, it condones slavery in the Sudan and the denial of women's basic working rights in Saudi Arabia. The Canadian labour bosses have earned a new name: union sheikhs.

I would think the CLC, CUPE, etc. have enough to do obtaining higher wages, pensions, better standards and safety conditions of work for their members without getting involved in world affairs.

How depressingly ignorant are the resolutions against Israel that were recently passed by both the Canadian Union of Public Employees and the Canadian Labour Congress. Do these union members have any idea about the incredibly wretched positions of unions within the Arab world, and in particular, in the Palestinian Authority (PA)?

There are no democratic unions under the rule of the PA. In fact, union leadership positions are appointed by the PA and are divided by PA Chairman Yasser Arafat as plum positions to satisfy various warlords within Gaza and West Bank. Union dues are siphoned off to fill the pockets of those appointees, with Arafat taking his required cut.

The Democracy and Workers' Rights Centre (DWRC) was established in 1993 following the Oslo accords. It's comprised of Palestinians who have sought to seek changes within the struggling union movement in the territories. Here is part of their own assessment of the situation of unions under Arafat:

"Poor labour legislation reinforces the weakness of the trade union movement, and keeps the trade unions under the hegemony of political factions. Political factions appoint union representatives. Democratic elections are not allowed. The representatives are appointed as a result of their political power, far removed from workers' demands and the realities of work conditions. The 'kings' of the trade union movement are appointed from political factions and their positions are dependent upon the relative strength of each faction and agreements between them. This weakens trade unions, as workers refuse to join. They feel like strangers, denied of their right to elect their own representatives. Since 1982, no elections have been held in the Palestine General Federation of Trade Unions."

Now compare this to the flourishing and well-entrenched union movement in Israel, and one can only wonder what exactly were the real motivations behind these political statements by two of Canada's largest labour groups.

Israel, Jews and the left

I have read and reread Jordy Cumming's letter (CJN, June 20).

In my earlier correspondence (CJN, June 6), I pointed out the anti-Semitism in the Arab world and in particular, the Palestinians with whom the Israelis are to make peace. How do you make peace with people who teach their children that the Jews are the vermin of the world and are to be destroyed? Palestinian mothers are proud of their children when they strap on explosives to kill themselves and as many Jewish women and children as possible.

Israel is surrounded by more than 200 million Arabs who seek to destroy all the Jews who live there. I am not dreaming; the Arabs have said so themselves. Cummings is looking for the "progressive, liberal elements of the Arab world." Where is the Palestinian left? There are no Palestinian peace movements. Arab marchers everywhere seem to be chanting "Death to Jews."

In the past 21 months, more than 500 Israelis have been killed and thousands have been wounded, many of them maimed for life. Israel has to contend with suicide bombers, drive-by shootings and terrorist attacks on settlements. Unlike Cummings, I believe Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon has shown remarkable restraint in the face of Arab attacks on the civilian population. Cummings is 6,000 miles away. What does he know of the terror Israelis have to live with every day?

Cummings and I can agree and call for a two-state solution. But to me, a two-state solution with murderers is no solution at all.

Dispelling myths about Jews in Muslim Lands

By SARAH TAIEB CARLEN

In Islam, there are three categories of human beings: first Muslims; then Jews and Christians – called ahl al-dhimma or dhimmis (people who are granted the protection of the Muslim ruler) and ahl al-kittab (people of the Book) because they received a divine revelation through the Torah and the New Testament, respectively; and, finally, people who do not believe in God.

As well, there are two political divisions. One is between the Dar al-Islam (House of Islam) and the Dar al-Harb (House of War), which, according to Islamic belief, are doomed to wage war against each other, with the final victory of Islam. The other is between the Muslims and the dhimmis.

The dhimmis' life was regulated by the Covenant of Omar according to the Qur'an's instruction: "fight those who do not practise the religion of truth from among those to whom the Book has been brought, until they pay the tribute by their hands, and be reduced low."

Jewish children learning Hebrew in Fez, in the early 20th century.

As Albert Memmi, a Tunisian-born philosopher and historian wrote: "the supposedly 'idyllic' life led by the Jews in Arab countries is all a myth!... Never... have the Jews lived in Moslem countries otherwise than as diminished people in an exposed position, periodically overcome and massacred so that they would be acutely conscious of their position... If we leave out the crematoria and the murders committed in Russia ... the sum total of the Jewish victims of the Christian world is probably no greater than the total number of victims of the successive pogroms, both big and small, perpetrated in the Moslem countries" (italics in the original).

Sometimes, the masses were incited to violence against the Jews by writings such as ibn-Azim's: "Let any prince upon whom Allah has bestowed some of His bounty take heed... Let him get away from this filthy, stinking, dirty crew beset with Allah's anger and malediction, with humiliation and wretchedness, misfortune, filth, and dirt, as no other people has ever been."

The Covenant stipulates that, on pain of death, dhimmis are forbidden to revile the Qur'an, Islam or Mohammed (because "it is not in order that they should behave that way that we most kindly granted them the dhimma"); to marry or live in concubinage with Muslim women; to injure Muslims in life or property; to assist the enemy or to harbour spies.

Dhimmis were also, and with slightly less grievous penalties attached, forbidden to build houses higher than those of the Muslims, to drink wine in public, or to proselytize among Muslims. This would be dangerous for the Muslims too, since apostasy was punished by death, because, according to Islamic belief, we were all born in a "natural state of religion," Islam, and it is our parents who made us Jews, Christians, animists, etc. This is why conversion to Islam usually attracts no particular attention on the part of the Muslims, because they see it as normal in the sense that the whole world will one day be Muslim. Similarly, people who embrace Islam do not say they converted, but instead believe that they have reverted to it, since they were "born into it."

Moreover, dhimmis were forbidden to pray, mourn or bury their dead in a way which might be offensive to Muslims, to use the same public baths as Muslims, to bear arms or to ride horses, (and when they were allowed to ride mules, they had to ride them sideways). They were forbidden to set foot on the soil of Mecca, because as the Qur'an stipulates: "Believers, know that the unbelievers are unclean. Let them not approach the Sacred Mosque."

A dhimmi's oath was invalidated by a Muslim's and the blood price demanded for the death of a dhimmi was less than that of a Muslim. Dhimmis had to talk in a lower voice than Muslims, to shelter Muslim travellers for at least three days, and their tombs had to be lower than those of Muslims. They had to pay special taxes, usually very high, and their inferior status was made even more humiliating because of the way they had to pay them: the dhimmi had to walk to where the tax collector was sitting and stand and wait. The tax collector would grab his collar and scream: "Pay the jizya [one of the taxes]." Once he received the jizya, the collector would give the dhimmi a shteke, or slap in the face.

By paying the jizya, the dhimmis guaranteed the safety of their lives and property. A Jewish family chronicle informs us that, in the ninth century, the caliph al-Mutahdid offered a wealthy Jewish banker from Baghdad, whom he had befriended, the elimination of all Jewish taxes. The banker begged him not to do so: "Through the tax, the Jew insures his existence. By eliminating it, you would give free rein to the populace to shed Jewish blood." This indicates that non-Muslims were tolerated on Muslim soil partly because they were economically useful, and this is why Muslim rulers sometimes discouraged conversion to Islam – so as not to lose a guaranteed source of income.

Dhimmis had to give right of way to Muslims, to wear distinctive clothing, distinguishing coloured patches and, sometimes, shoes of different colours. Slaves and dhimmi women were not allowed to wear a veil because it was a symbol of respectability. No violation of these rules was ever forgiven, even by the most liberal ruler.

Although it is commonly believed that the yellow badge originated in Christian Europe, in fact, it was first imposed in Muslim lands. Bernard Lewis and other scholars assert that a caliph in Baghdad was the first to force it on the Jews in the ninth century and that the practice spread from there to the West during the Middle Ages.

When they died, the dhimmis' property was confiscated by the ruler unless their relatives were able to convince him that they were the rightful heirs according to Islamic law. When this was not possible, or when the deceased left no heir, the estate was confiscated.

However, there was a positive aspect to the status of dhimmi: it was a contract between the state and the dhimmis which, in peaceful times, provided safety for the dhimmis' life and property. The leader of the Jewish community was obligated to ensure that all of the dhimmi rules and restrictions were observed. The Jews who abode by the covenant were, in theory if not always in practice, granted the right to practise their religion and to organize their community freely.

The Muslims, for their part, were obligated to remind the dhimmis, by any means, of their inferior status because it was assigned to them by law and because, if the Muslims did not, the dhimmis' behaviour would upset the social structure of Islamic society.

Jews and Christians were usually treated in the same way, but the Qur'an is much less hostile to the Christians than to the Jews. This was partly because the Jews of Mecca and Medina adamantly refused to convert to Islam, whereas the Christians, being so far from those places, did not cause bitterness and anger in Mohammed and among the early Muslims: "You will find that the most implacable of men in their enmity to the Faithful are the Jews and the pagans, and that the nearest in affection to them are those who say: 'we are Christians.' That is because there are priests and monks among them; and because they are free from pride."

Yemenite Jews (ca. 1910)
[Photos from The Dhimmi: Jews and Christians under Islam by Bat Ye'or, Associated University Presses]

Muslims considered the Jew the lowest being imaginable. An Arabic expression states that: "[If I am lying], may I become a Jew." But Mohammed, who was fiercely monotheistic, despised the Christian religion far more than he did Judaism because of the dogmas of the Trinity and the divinity of Jesus.

It has often been assumed that the Jews' rejection of Mohammed was the most painful disappointment of his life, because it jeopardized his religious status considerably. He had adopted several Jewish practices such as the dietary laws, the kibla (orientation at the time of prayer) towards Jerusalem, the Shabbat rest, and the fast of Yom Kippur. But not only did the Jews not convert, they also tended to argue with Mohammed as they corrected his misquotations of the Bible and the Mishnah.

> 'Muslims considered the Jew the lowest being imaginable'

Disappointed, Mohammed replaced the fast of Yom Kippur with the fast of Ramadan, the Shabbat rest with Friday rest, the kibla towards Jerusalem with prayer towards Mecca, and he significantly modified the dietary laws.

Furthermore, he wrote very insulting and sometimes cruel verses, as well as positive ones, in the Qur'an about the Jews.

Mohammed's anger and dismay at the Jews motivated him to fight them from 624 to 628 in order to expropriate their property and kill them. However, what was more damaging in the longer term is that he included reports of these fights in the most spiteful terms in the Qur'an, the Holy Book of more than one billion people throughout the world, which every Muslim is supposed to memorize from an early age and which most pious Muslims believe was dictated to Mohammed by God.

Visit to Washington

My recent journey to Washington, D.C., made me aware of the many memorable aspects of the American capital.

It houses, of course, some of the world's most recognizable structures, like the White House and the Washington Monument. It also prides itself on the Library of Congress and famous galleries, and my latest journey made me aware of its stunning parks and lovely environs.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

On my trip, I had the privilege of lecturing at one of the city's synagogues, and was able to visit with friends of long-standing.

Not surprisingly, social encounters are likely to have a political colouration, but no more so than I remembered from previous visits. International crises and gossip about well-known figures were rarely discussed. Instead, issues such as American policy regarding Israel were prominent, since I found myself in exclusively Jewish company.

Roosevelt Memorial

Most memorable was my visit to the Franklin Delano Roosevelt Memorial – a stunning combination of rocks, waterfalls, sculptures and engravings of significant citations from his speeches, all of which are also readable in braille letters engraved in the granite.

The leisurely walk through the several sections of the memorial and back along the shores of the Tidal Basin, fringed in ancient Japanese cherry trees, afforded me yet another vista of this remarkable city.

Thus, to me, Washington represents, in a very special way, the many varied aspects of not only the United States itself, but also of the opportunities the nation offers its citizens.

I could not help but remember that, back in 1935, I came to the shores of North America as a refugee, one of the many millions who had preceded me and who, like me, retained a deep sense of gratitude for having been able to make it their home.

As well, during this visit, I was once again struck with the degree of admiration that Americans have for their political heroes, something that is sadly lacking in Canada.

Summer from both sides

The most fascinating aspect of the summer is that we allow the beautiful weather and sunshine to overshadow the bad that might be taking place in the world. In my case, instead of spending much of May and June reading the newspaper or sitting in front of the television, I was busy preparing programs for camp. This meant that, for a brief period of time, the goings-on in Israel were closer to the back of my mind while I rejoiced about finishing university and making this summer a fantastic one.

Darcie Richler in Halifax

Sadly, I was abruptly brought back to reality when I read an article about Moshe Eini in this very newspaper.

For those who do not know, Moshe Eini was an Israeli soldier who was tragically killed in February while on duty in the West Bank. For most, Moshe is like the rest of the casualties of the intifadah: a son to parents, a brother to siblings and one dearly missed by many. For me, Moshe represents the essence of my frustrations, and the epitome of my nightmares.

Moshe's father Ezra had a memorable impact on my siblings and me. For a few weeks in late December 1988, Ezra took my family all over the land of Israel. In that time, we saw the country through the eyes of someone who had an obvious love for the land. Ezra showed more enthusiasm and knowledge about each new place we visited than he did about the one before.

At the same time, Ezra also let us into his personal life. He told us about his children, who were around the same ages as the three children in our family. He explained Israel's mandatory conscription policy. He spoke about his own experiences in the Israel Defence Forces in an upfront and honest tone that children usually don't get to hear.

I still remember sitting in total awe as Ezra explained that, one day in the future, his children would protect the land they love so much.

I also remember sitting at a function in Halifax, ironically on Yom Ha'atzmaut, when I learned about the tragic fate of Moshe Eini.

At that moment, I comprehended even more deeply the grief that Israel has felt as a nation. While I did not know Moshe personally, I felt the loss as though he was someone close to me. Even though I doubted that Ezra would ever remember me – since he has interacted with literally thousands of North Americans through his work – I still felt that it was important to e-mail him my condolences.

CBC, CTV and CNN would have you believe that when a tragedy occurs in Israel, families and friends simply need a reassuring phone call from their loved ones. Ezra's experience enlightened me about how Israel functions socially. When a tragedy happens, the country grieves together as a nation – irrespective of one's stream of Judaism, political beliefs or anything else. Israelis have come to live and know that when a suicide bomber strikes, or a soldier gets killed, it could have just as easily been their own son or daughter, or mother or father. And then, together, as a nation, they take a breath, accept the reality and move on to the next day, knowing that again, that day might bring about the beginning of the same process.

This summer, let us all promise ourselves that we will keep supporting Israel in any way we can. While it is human nature to embrace the season, we must remember that just a 12-hour plane ride away, a country is in despair and a huge portion of its tourism industry – a key sector of the economy – is virtually non-existent because we are not there supporting it.

Let us also not forget about families like Moshe's who have an empty seat at their Shabbat tables because they see the existence of the State of Israel being more crucial than any single life.

Until next month, have a safe and healthy summer.

Dealing with anti-Israel propaganda

I recently ventured to Toronto to look for an apartment and to visit Ryerson University before I make the big move to that city at the end of August. I have been anticipating my departure from Winnipeg and my migration to Ryerson for a couple years now, and I am very excited about what lies ahead, but this article is not about the expectations I have for my journalism career.

Bryan Borzykowski in Winnipeg

I visited Ryerson hoping to acquire some information about my coming year, but my journey to Dundas and Yonge streets ended with feelings of guilt, confusion and anger.

As I walked toward Ryerson's main building, I noticed two men on a street corner distributing a small booklet. Something stopped me. I couldn't make out what the men were saying, but I felt pulled in their direction. I approached one of the men and without any dialogue, he handed me a paper filled with anti-Israel articles. My heart stopped. What was I going to do? I was confronted with something directly related to my connection with Israel and Judaism.

I have been faced with anti-Israel, pro-Palestinian propaganda on only two occasions in my life, and both times I did not know how to react. My initial thought in this instance was to yell at the men and express my outrage at what they were doing. But I thought that wouldn't get me anywhere. So I decided to do what I was needed to do at Ryerson and think of something to say when I crossed their paths again.

But as I exited Ryerson's main building, I realized I did not have the confidence to confront them. What would I say? Do I know enough about events in the Middle East to defend my position? The two men were Arabs, so I figured that they must have some knowledge of what is going on. So I walked past them, still trying to gather the courage to confront them. The further I walked the guiltier I felt. I should have done something, I should have said something. I have to represent the Jewish people.

I have strong suspicions that many readers out there have felt these same feelings. When confronted with anti-Semitism, or anti-Israel statements, it is difficult to know what to do. Confronting these people might lead to a heated argument at best, or possibly something more troubling. I feel that if I do confront these people, I need to know my facts or my argument will be fruitless. How do we approach these one-on-one situations?

I don't have the answer – as you can clearly see – but I think dealing with these encounters are just as important as holding large rallies. Jews have the confidence to gather at the legislative building and support Israel, but do we have the confidence and knowledge to speak up against Palestinian supporters, or even misguided peers?

For me, I think the confidence will come. I feel much more knowledgeable about the Arab-Israeli conflict than I did a few months ago, but I think I need to learn more before I can present a clear and accurate argument. This will come from paying attention to current events and learning more about Jewish culture and history, something that doesn't happen overnight.

This incident has led me to worry somewhat about my upcoming year at Ryerson. This past year, I have read about a number of anti-Semitic events at my future school and this makes me wonder about the environment I will be entering and what I would do if my Judaism is challenged again. There was no anti-Semitism at the University of Winnipeg while I was there, and as a result, I am largely unfamiliar with personal challenges to my core values. I am hoping that, if confronted with a similar situation in the future, that I will take a stand. And although I hope this kind of thing doesn't happen frequently, the more I am confronted personally, the more confidence I will have to react and do something about it.

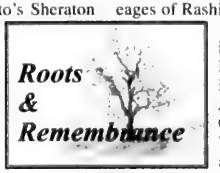
Toronto hosting international genealogy conference

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

One month from now, Jewish genealogists from around the world will converge on Toronto's Sheraton Hotel for what promises to be one of the most exciting international conferences on Jewish genealogy since the annual event began in New York City more than 20 years ago.



The period from Sunday, Aug. 4, through Friday, Aug. 9, will see a whirlwind of activities. More than 150 talks and meetings have been scheduled, with at least five taking place at any given time. Distinguished participants from the United States will include genealogist Miriam Weiner, rabbinic genealogist Neil Rosenstein, and Antony Polansky, the Poland specialist from Brandeis. Also expected, to name only a few more, are specialist Alexander Beider from Paris; Yale Reisner of the Jewish Historical Institute, Warsaw; and Batya Unterschatz-Landsman, former director of the Israeli Search Bureau for Missing Persons, Jerusalem.

These and many others will make expert presentations on the major lands of the Diaspora and Israel – all the places "where once we walked." Minor threads in our rich historic tapestry will also be explored in talks on the Jews of Philadelphia, China, Muslim lands and other places. Other topics include the Khazars, the Oppenheimer banking family, JewishGen and the Internet, the Ellis Island database, genetics and DNA research, and the much-debated lineages of Rashi and King David.

For those interested in Canadian genealogy, Harold Troper is speaking on Toronto's Jewish community and Canadian Jews in World War II. There's also Ruth and Stanley Diamond on Jewish vital records in Quebec, Gladys Friedman Paulin on the Jewish farm colonies of Saskatchewan and Marie-Louise Perron on the National Archives of Canada and the Canadian Genealogy Centre. (For full details of all talks, visit the Web site at www.jgstoronto2002.ca.)

As at previous conferences, the proceedings will begin with a beginner's workshop and end with a closing kosher banquet. Birds of a Feather (groups that share common research interests) will flock together and special interest groups (SIGs) will congregate for diverse topical discussions. Family trees will be exhibited, computer genealogy programs will be displayed and vendor tables will be piled high with intriguing wares for sale.

A resource room will provide access to many essential resources such as the Drouin indexing project. Newly compiled from various sources by the Jewish Genealogical Society of Montreal, this index lists 75,000 Jewish vital and other records in Quebec between 1841 and 1942.

As if all this isn't enough, a mini-film festival of roots-related documentaries has been arranged for the hotel's two screening rooms. Tours of Jewish Toronto, the city and major research facilities like the Robarts Library and the Ontario Archives are also being offered.

While the conference syllabus will likely run to hundreds of pages, the number of attendees may actually exceed 1,000, the majority coming from the United States. Each will wear a conference badge listing surnames and ancestral towns they are researching. Predictably, there will be astonished encounters of newfound cousins in elevators, and a dense thicket of notes and announcements will sprout daily on the conference bulletin board.

Not surprisingly, word of this major conference has been buzzing around the genealogical community for months. Having attended about seven of the last 10 conferences, I still find it hard to describe the wondrous synergy that the event always generates.

Considering recent advances of the Internet and the growth of a critical mass of researchers worldwide, there's no better time than now to research your Jewish family tree – and no better opportunity for it than the upcoming conference. Register online at www.jgstoronto2002.ca or call 905-882-2259. I hope to see you there.

Jews, Gypsies and Jewpsies

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

I suppose that 3,000 years ago, in the land of Israel, there existed a true form of Jewish music. With a Temple service whose functions were accompanied by the instruments and vocals of the Levites – indeed, with a gifted young king who both played and composed – there must have been such a thing as indigenous Jewish music. No more.

Since those days, though we may consider some types of music to be Jewish, in reality, they are anything but, however we may insist that they are. In the same way I would argue that there is no such thing as Jewish food, I say there is no such thing as Jewish music. Both are cultural adaptations, souvenirs of our long travels of the past 2,000 years in the Diaspora.

Yes, we may lay claim to klezmer music as being something quintessentially Jewish. The fact remains, however, that klezmer is nothing more than an adaptation of Gypsy tunes. We may play klezmer at our weddings and bar mitzvahs and even give a Jewish name to this music (kli zemer), but its origin remains the same.

Music, of course, is paramount to the Sephardi experience, but here too it is not of Jewish origin.

The Pyrenees mountain range geographically divides Spain from France and the rest of Europe. The historical result of that separation has been the development of a completely different culture. The name of the region is called Andalusia, and hence the term Andalusian music.

The music of Andulus contains in it echoes of Hindu, Greek, Roman and Moorish tunes. As well, it is influenced by those wizards of music, the Gypsies. That part of Andalusian music is called flamenco. The origins of the word are as much a mystery as are the origins of those Gypsies who first sang it.

After the Expulsion, this unique and colourful style was carried mainly into North Africa. Culture is not static and it is always changing. The music of the North African or Maghrebi Jew is also very influenced by Arabic music and as of the last 200 years, Turkish tunes and a few French marches have been thrown in as well.

If klezmer music is boisterously loud and joyful, flamenco is soulful. It expresses an intensely deep sentimentality, even tragedy. A flamenco tune is typically long and drawn out. It is usually first preceded by a wholly different tune that serves as an introduction or inspiration to the actual song. It is sung solo with minor instrumental accompaniment and it invites a response from its listeners, but more than that, it demands their utmost attention.

Flamenco has been incorporated into the prayers and chants of Sephardi rituals. It is quite possible today to hear the most solemn of prayers in the flamenco style. From the tunes of the Kedushah on Shabbat morning to those of the Havdalah on Saturday night and those of Tisha b'Av, flamenco is an integral part of prayer.

Did the Kushites save Judea?

The Rescue of Jerusalem*, by Henry Aubin, Random House, 2002, $39.95

Books
Bernard Baskin

In 701 BCE, King Sennacherib and his mighty Assyrian army laid siege to Jerusalem. All seemed lost. As the Assyrian battering rams shattered the walls that surrounded the city, and food became scarce, surrender seemed inevitable. King Hezekiah and the prophet Isaiah were almost bereft of hope.

Then, one of the enduring mysteries of history occurred. Abruptly, the invaders abandoned their siege and fled Judea. The one-sentence biblical account from Kings II is terse and cryptic. "That night an angel of the Lord went out and struck down 185,000 in the Assyrian camp, and the following morning they were all dead corpses."

This inexplicable event preserved Judaism and made possible the eventual emergence of Christianity and Islam. What happened? The usual explanation is that plague, the dread scourge of antiquity, providentially struck the enemy camp with rapid and disastrous results.

Henry Aubin, a long-time journalist who is now an investigative reporter for the The Gazette in Montreal, confides that his adopted son is of African descent. In searching for suitable material for him about black heroes and positive events in African history, Aubin stumbled on information about the civilization of the Kushites. That serendipitous discovery led to years of research and to a different and original explanation of what happened that night in 701 BCE. Aubin's thesis is that the Judeans were saved by the army of the Kushite Pharaoh of Egypt, made up largely of black Africans from what is now Sudan.

Impressively, and with wide knowledge of Egyptian and Near-Eastern history and culture, the author postulates that the renowned General Taharqa overwhelmed the Assyrian forces. He argues that racism on the part of scholars has kept the true story from being taught. The influential scholar Archibald Henry Sayce (1845-1933), for instance, dismissed the possibility that a "negro dynasty" could have defeated the Assyrian army.

Aubin writes that "in the late 19th century when the Western imperialist adventure in Africa got under way, it relied heavily on the idea that if one's own civilization dominates other peoples, they must be inherently inferior. Their history, accordingly, must be worthless." Aubin believes that this disdainful outlook has stuck despite all evidence to the contrary. As a result, most leading biblical scholars and Egyptologists claim to this day that the Hebrew Bible is contemptuous of Kushites and that their foreign policy and military performance were pitiable.

Interestingly, the author indicates that important rabbinic commentators of past centuries credit Taharqa with a vital role in causing Sennacherib's departure. These include Radak (1160-1235), Malbim (1809-1879) and Rabbi Isaac Mayer Wise (1819-1900).

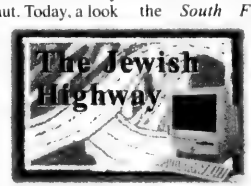
Although the author is concerned with complex matters of history, archeology, biblical interpretation, etc, he manages to write about them with a light hand. His literary skill is first rate and the evidence he presents is carefully marshalled and well argued.

Readers who are intrigued by one of the major unanswered biblical questions or are drawn to the many-sided world of the Near East 2,700 years ago will find this a fascinating work.

Jews in space – part 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Later this month, Ilan Ramon is scheduled to liftoff as part of the crew of NASA's space shuttle Columbia. When he does, he will ride into history as Israel's first astronaut. Today, a look at the astronaut and his historic mission.



Ilan Ramon was born in Tel Aviv and raised in Ramat Gan and Be'er Sheva. He joined the Israeli Air Force in 1972 and has flown various jets including the F-16 Falcon. In a profile in The CJN, he wouldn't disclose what sort of missions he has flown but Ramon did command an F-16 squadron. [http://www.cjnews.com/pastissues/99/june24-99/front5.htm].

While aboard the space shuttle, payload specialist Ramon will be responsible for investigating the role that desert dust could play in affecting global weather patterns. His project is being run jointly by NASA and the Israel Space Agency. You can read about the project, details about Columbia's mission and crew biographies at the official NASA Web site [http://Spa... Research.nasa.gov/sts-107/].

Although Ramon will be out of Earth's atmosphere, he still won't be far from the planet's conflicts. Security for all NASA missions has been increased since Sept. 11. And although Ramon says he does not fear for his safety, Associated Press reports that NASA has been in contact with the U.S. State Department and that additional security is planned for Ramon's launch [http://www.space.com/missionlaunches/israeli_astronaut_020517.html].

Once Ramon is safely in zero gravity, one of his first questions is bound to be, "What's to eat?" According to the South Florida Sun-Sentinel, Ramon is the first Jewish astronaut to request kosher meals. Here is what will be waiting for him: Florentine lasagna, beef stew, chicken Mediterranean, My Kind of Chicken and Old World Stew (beef with brown rice, zucchini, pinto beans and flavours of the Middle East) [http://www.sun-sentinel.com/news/sfl-koshernasa.story].

If you are curious what kosher space food tastes like, you don't have to go through rigorous NASA training to find out. You can order the same "thermostabilized" kosher food that Ilan Ramon will be dining on from My Own Meals of Deerfield, Ill. [http://www.myownmeals.com/].

Now that it is becoming more common for Jews to travel into space, the once theoretical and even humorous debates over halachah in space have now become much more practical. In a series titled Stars of David, Miryam Wahrman examines the implications of halachah observance in space. She quotes from Deuteronomy 12:1, which says that we must perform mitzvot "all the days which you are alive on the Earth." Some rabbis have said Jews are exempt from some mitzvot when they leave the Earth because those mitzvot are meant to be practised "on the earth." Others argue that the artificially created living conditions in a spacecraft are akin to bringing the earth with you – and the obligation to perform mitzvot.

There is also a discussion about the implications of observing Shabbat in space – when you experience sunrise and sunset every 90 minutes. Wahrman repeats the classic joke about the Jewish astronaut who returns to Earth and is asked about his experience in space: "Oy, am I tired! Shacharis, Mincha, Maariv, Shacharis, Mincha, Maariv..." [http://www.jewish.com/news/columnists/miryam.html].

Astronauts often take a souvenir or other memento into space. Last time, I mentioned astronaut Jeffrey Hoffman, who took a Torah into orbit. Ramon, whose mother survived Auschwitz, contacted the Yad Vashem Holocaust memorial in Jerusalem and requested a Holocaust-related item to take into space. Yad Vashem chose the drawing Moon Landscape, which was created by Petr Ginz, a 14-year-old Jewish boy, during his incarceration in the Theresienstadt ghetto. Petr Ginz died in Auschwitz in 1944. You can see his artwork at the Yad Vashem Web site [http://www.yadvashem.org.il/about_yad/press_room/temp_index_press_room_ramon.html].

Ramon explained the importance of taking Ginz' art into space. "I feel that my journey fulfills the dream of Petr Ginz 58 years on. A dream that is ultimate proof of the greatness of the soul of a boy imprisoned within the ghetto walls, the walls of which could not conquer his spirit. Ginz's drawings, stored at Yad Vashem, are a testimony to the triumph of the spirit."

Toronto Jewish police officers get together

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

It's safe to say that among the many honourable professions Jewish parents might wish their children to pursue, law enforcement would not be among the first choices.

That's something that has always struck Peel Regional Police officer Claude Gelbard as odd, considering that almost all Israeli police officers are Jews and in American cities like New York, Los Angeles and Chicago, there are thousands of Jews serving on the thin blue line.

But in the Greater Toronto Area, there is only a handful of Jewish officers walking the beat, performing administrative duties and training new recruits.

Recently, about a dozen Jewish officers from four Toronto-area police forces gathered for an informal evening of shmoozing and noshing in the Lipa Green Building. Several others who had been invited but who were on duty could not attend.

OPP Staff Sgt. Alan Zunder had wondered for some time just how many Jewish cops were out there. He had talked about it with his boyhood friend, Bernie Farber, who serves as executive-director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region.

Both knew of a handful of Jewish police officers, and over the course of time, they discussed the possibility of bringing them together.

Zunder and Farber made a few phone calls and through word of mouth, one contact led to the other. Eventually, a list was assembled of about 25 Jewish officers serving on the Toronto, Peel, York and Durham forces, as well as with the OPP. Most were quite receptive to the idea of an informal meeting and the inaugural dinner followed, hosted by Farber.

"It's not a big group, obviously," Zunder said. "We're a pretty small minority in policing. I thought it'd be good to hear their experiences in police work."

Canadian Jewish Congress official Bernie Farber (second row, far right) recently hosted an informal gathering of Jewish police officers at the Lipa Green Building. The officers, who serve in and around Toronto, are also scheduled to get together for a summertime barbecue.

Gelbard, who serves in the recruiting bureau with the Peel police, said the evening was an informal get-together – an opportunity to socialize rather than to create a permanent organization.

"It was more of an opportunity to say, hey, you're not alone. There are other Jewish cops out there."

Aaron Groskopf, a front line officer in Peel, was intrigued at the prospect of meeting other Jewish officers. Groskopf, who at 25 is one of the youngest in the group, said he was surprised there were as many Jewish cops as attended: "It's definitely more than I would've thought."

Gelbard, whose wife Sherry is an auxiliary officer (she volunteers at community events), always realized police work was not a typical job for young Jews. In fact, his own parents had wondered why he chose the profession.

He believes Jewish police officers should take the opportunity to get into the community and show there is nothing wrong with being a Jewish cop. It's an honourable profession."

Zunder has come up against some skeptics in his own life. "When I tell people that I'm a Jewish cop, people thought I was adopted or half Jewish," he said.

Even visitors to Toronto are sometimes surprised there are Jewish cops in the city. Zunder recounts one occasion early in his career when he stopped a car full of Israelis for a traffic violation. He overheard their comments, in Hebrew, about his work, and when they departed, he shocked them with a greeting in Hebrew.

Like Zunder, Groskopf attended Jewish day school as a youth – in Groskopf's case, Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto. Even then he wanted to be a police officer. His mother recently unearthed a family time capsule in which Groskopf expressed the wish, at age 10, to be a cop.

When Groskopf finally joined the Peel force, it didn't exactly shock his parents. They had already been treated to a surprise regarding their son's career choices a few years earlier when he had announced he was moving to Israel and would join the Israeli Defence Forces (IDF).

Groskopf served for just under two years in the IDF's Golani Brigade before returning to Toronto. He credits a strong desire to help others for his career decisions.

Zunder, who attended Hebrew day school in Ottawa, said his family "did not receive with favour" his decision to become a police officer. But "Jewish cops want, I think, a little more adventure, a little less nine to five.

"I wanted to see how things were and not just read about it in the newspaper… We see it as it is, not as it should be. There's a draw to it, a kind of a tonic.

"We're usually type A personalities. You hear about it, you want to do something about it."

Norm Gardner, chair of the Toronto Police Services Board, was unable to attend the dinner, but he supports the effort to bring together Jewish police officers. There are currently associations of Black and South Asian officers in Toronto, he noted.

Gardner, whose nephew is a police officer, believes Jews are under-represented in Toronto-area police forces, based on their percentage of the GTA's population. In recent years, he said, a few more Jewish recruits have joined the Toronto force and he knows of three Jewish women serving in GTA police units.

In New York, Gardner said, a Jewish police association called Shomrim boasts more than 3,000 members.

As for the local Jewish police group, he said "it's good to get to know each other and help each other in terms of their profession and to encourage young people to get into policing."

Farber, who is planning a follow-up barbecue, called the get-together a wonderful experience.

"We talked about the need to urge Jews to look at law enforcement as a career… to demystify law enforcement among Jews. A lot of people have misconceptions that it's not a job for a Jewish boy or girl."

The current crop of Jewish officers can serve as mentors to the up and coming recruits, he said.

Farber said the officers report that they have experienced almost no anti-Semitic incidents or prejudice while on duty, Farber said.

"I think that speaks well for the police force."

Heschel students are seen in Halifax with the first Jewish lieutenant-governor in Canada, Myra Freeman.

Heschel students visit Halifax

By ADAM GRACHNIK
CJN Intern

A four-day trip to Halifax that brought together everything students have been studying was part of the excitement of graduating, said the principal of the Toronto Heschel school Gail Baker.

This trip made "a real experience of what students are studying, both generally and Judaically," said Baker. "It gave a reality and realism [that was] more than looking in a book."

The 11 Grade 8 students are the first class to graduate from Heschel, a Jewish day school that uses multi-sensory activities to present different approaches to learning in an arts-integrated environment.

Part of the Toronto Heschel School curriculum is a study of civilizations. For three years, among other topics, students study world civilizations, including the Judaic history of the period they are learning about. This year, their final year, they focused on Canadian history and had a unit on Jewish immigration to Canada.

Their four-day trip to Halifax, allowed them to see first hand what they had studied.

The focal point was a visit to Pier 21, the port where, between 1921 and 1971, one million immigrants first set foot in Canada.

"It was really interesting to see all the pictures and boats. [The immigrants] didn't know where they were going or what they were coming to," said Ayla Mandel, 13, whose bubbie came to Canada through Pier 21.

Mitchell Bank, 13, added that "it was [great] to learn about your family and where they came from and how they got to Toronto."

The students also met with the first Jewish lieutenant-governor in Canada, Myra Freeman.

"It was really cool, because she was Jewish. She told us all about her job," said Mitchell of the visit with Freeman, who is also the first female to serve as lieutenant-governor of Nova Scotia.

Freeman's message was that students can do anything they want, and they shouldn't be afraid to have courage, said Judy Leitner, the students' teacher. The speech was "the best part of the trip," she added.

The students also had the opportunity to meet with people their own age, by speaking with members of the Zionist youth group, Young Judaea.

"I always wondered what it was like being Jewish in Halifax," Ayla said. "[I] learned how hard it was and how much they cared to be Jewish. [Also] about being Jewish and what it means."

Leitner stressed that the trip was important because it echoed the school's mandate.

"It really ties into our philosophy of how we teach and what we have been studying," she said. "[The trip] allows them to have history come alive, so it's not passive but active learning. We need to have more trips like this to have meaning and understanding."

The students also braved cold weather and rain to go whale watching and were surprised at the airport to see two stretch limousines waiting for them. Both experiences, Mandel said, were "really fun."

Owen Sound Jews save their synagogue

By ADAM GRACHNIK
CJN Intern

OWEN SOUND, Ont. — In a tiny Jewish community tucked into an inlet off Georgian Bay, 13 Jewish families have saved their synagogue.

With the help of a local artist, they also decorated the Beth Ezekiel Synagogue with stained glass windows that tell the stories of some of the Jewish people in the town. All 15 windows were dedicated at a recent ceremony. Each was sponsored by a family and shows personal tales of life, love, courage, devotion and tradition through various symbols.

Last year, a large supporting beam collapsed inside the shul building. The repairs demanded a massive financial investment from the congregation, which for a small Jewish community was almost crippling.

L'Chaim (to life)

"We faced some pretty hard decisions as to what to do," said Jeff Elie, who moved to Owen Sound from Toronto in 1989. "Should we just leave it? Save it? Sell the land? These are questions we faced."

But the congregation managed to collect $35,000 from a variety of sources, including 19 years of bingo revenue.

"For a community that is so small, we can do so big. We are very proud," said Alisa Van Wyck, the Israeli born president of the shul. "[The windows] brighten up the synagogue and make people feel comfortable."

Elie said, "The windows played a part in [making us] work through the renovation project. [They] really pulled it together to save this synagogue."

He added that they gave people a reason to continue believing in the synagogue and its future.

One of those family histories is of the Levinsons. After surviving Kristallnacht (Night of Broken Glass) in Germany in November 1938, the Levinsons were given train tickets to England by an elderly couple who opted to sacrifice their own fate to help the young couple. They made their way to China, then travelled to Canada and eventually came to Owen Sound, where Manfred Levinson took the job of rabbi of the local shul. His daughter, Miriam, married the grandson of one of the shul's founding members, Isaac Ezekiel Cadesky. Their daughter, Goldie Ronald, and her family live in the town today.

The Journey

"By putting this window up, the story [of her family] is there forever. It's a way of documenting it," said Ronald, adding that the shul means everything to her and her family.

Her window, called The Journey, features a picture of a boat at the end of a train track. At the top, jagged shards of glass symbolize Kristallnacht; at the bottom, grapes represent the ripening of life in Owen Sound.

Elie's family, whose window is called L'Chaim (To Life), was struck by tragedy just over a year ago with the loss of his 46-year-old brother Jack. The window contains three butterflies, two in the centre representing him and his sister Shelley, and one at the top, separated from the others, representing his brother. The loss has taught Elie the importance of family and life.

"Family is ultimately the most important thing in anyone's life," he said, adding that there wasn't a dry eye at the dedication ceremony as he recounted the story behind his window.

The event, according to Elie, was so joyous and emotional that the crowd of 100 people suddenly erupted into a horah through the synagogue.

"It was something," Elie said.

Leigh Greaves, the owner of Artemisia, the Owen Sound-based company that made each window, was also moved by the project.

"Every window is special," Greaves said. "[It's] very touching for me, to see people in our town, with such history and families. It really opened my eyes."

Greaves, a non-Jewish, 19-year Owen Sound resident, worked for over a year on the windows, learning about the town's Jewish roots.

"It has been very rewarding on many levels," she said. "I know so many of these people. I didn't know they were Jewish and now I understand where their drive for community evolves from."

The first synagogue in Owen Sound was established in 1904 in a small space above a store. After it had grown beyond that space, the congregation purchased a church and converted it into a synagogue in 1947, which was named in honour of Cadesky. Levinson, the full-time rabbi, lived with his family in the shul and held regular services. The synagogue's membership began to decline as the economy deteriorated in the '80s, but it persevered and in 1991, the building was designated a heritage site.

Today, the synagogue offers Hebrew education twice a month to six children and hosts services for their members. The community is small and close-knit.

"We're like a big family, helping each other," said Van Wyck. "We feel very comfortable, everyone knows everyone. It is a great feeling."

McGill student spearheads international AIDS project

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

McGill University student Aaron Levenstadt will be one of the few presenters at this week's International AIDS Conference in Barcelona who doesn't have an MD or a PhD after his name.

In fact, the well-spoken 20-year-old biochemistry major has only just finished his first year of undergraduate studies. At McGill, Levenstadt devoted much of his time to establishing a campus AIDS coalition and organizing its main research project, to be conducted next month in Guyana, with a planned follow-up next year in Zimbabwe.

As a high school student at Thornlea Secondary School, where he graduated as valedictorian, Levenstadt volunteered in the lab of Toronto AIDS specialist Dr. Michael Silverman, developing a computerized tracking system for drugs that were being taken on missions to the developing world.

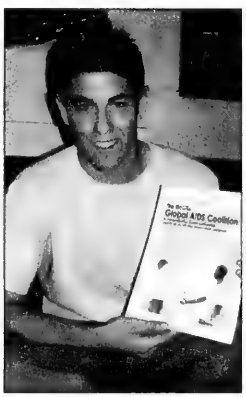
Last summer, Levenstadt studied at Harvard University where he became involved with the school's AIDS coalition, but it was his experience as a grandchild of Holocaust survivors that moved to take action against the disease.

The similarities between the AIDS crisis in Africa and the Holocaust are uncanny, Levenstadt said in an interview last week at his Thornhill home, recalling that he first heard the analogy at a conference at which Silverman spoke.

"Twenty million people have died. Another 20 to 25 million will die. We have the resources to help them, but they're not being mobilized."

When he entered McGill, Levenstadt discovered, to his dismay, that there was no AIDS coalition among the school's many clubs and activities. He decided to start one himself and thought he would be lucky to attract 20 people. Instead, 150 students showed up for a preliminary meeting. Seventy-one signed up.

When Levenstadt travels to Guyana next month as part of the McGill Global AIDS Coalition team, he and seven other students will study the effectiveness of AIDS education using different combinations of presenters, both North American and local. They will also take thousands of condoms to distribute.



Aaron Levenstadt

Silverman will accompany the group, and Ve'ahavta, the Toronto-based Jewish humanitarian organization, is also involved in the project.

The Guyana research, which Levenstadt will discuss in Barcelona, aims to find an educational method that is equally effective in different cultures. This would be more cost-effective than developing different approaches for different cultures, he explained. Students will also compare the effectiveness of less costly group presentations to one-on-one counselling.

The McGill coalition's activities over the year included AIDS education and events like bake sales and dances to fund its research project.

If every university in North America had an AIDS coalition with a similar link to a community in the developing world, Levenstadt said, each one could "knock a little piece off the iceberg [and] you could possibly start having some kind of melting effect."

Although his activities at McGill meant a lot of work and a lot of lost sleep – he was also president of McGill's Freshman Undergraduate Science Society (FUSS) and finished the year with a cumulative GPA of 3.94 – Levenstadt said he had a fun year.

Will he be one of the medical doctors at a future conference? Not if he follows through on his plan to study law. He hopes to become involved eventually with the ethical and law-making aspects of genetic research. Medicine, however, is "still a thought."

האם הגדר תעזור? קשה לדעת, אבל חייבים לנסות. העובדה ששמונים אחוז ישראלים יהודים רוצים גדר אומרת שהרוב היחתרי בישראל רוצה הפרדה ואינו רואה את עצמו מתעסק, שותף, או שולט בפלשתינאים.

חדשות טובות

not just a resolve, make it a reality!

One hour to show how much you care

With Israel on our minds and in our hearts, let's use the Three Weeks to redouble our efforts for her future. Let's come together in our shuls for a one hour program to hear a stirring message on video from Israel Chief Rabbi Yisrael Meir Lau, shlita, with a call to action by leaders of the North American Jewish community. Come to say Tehillim and to learn what positive steps you can take to advocate for, support and visit Israel.

You have these Three Weeks to show how sad you feel about Israel's past and Israel's present. Take one hour to show how much you care for Israel's future.

The Three Weeks (Bein Hametzarim), between the fasts of the 17th of Tammuz (June 27) and the 9th of Av (July 18), is the saddest period in the Jewish year, when we mourn the destruction of the first and second sacred temples in Jerusalem, and our exile.

Join with the Orthodox Union at 9:30am (Eastern DST) on the morning of Tisha b'Av (July 18) in a live web broadcast of Kinot, with introductions and explanations by Rabbi Dr. Tzvi Hersh Weinreb. Visit www.ou.org for details.

JVS conference a chance to 'share insights'

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The annual conference of the International Association of Jewish Vocational Services (AIJVS) held recently in Toronto was a forum to build on one another's successes, says the executive director of JVS of Greater Toronto.

"Each JVS started out as a group of volunteers that came together to respond to the needs of Jewish immigrants, and each has evolved into a significant organization. We find it helpful to share our insights," said Karen Goldenberg, who was awarded the Bernie Rosenthal Executive Director Award.

About 25 cities were represented at the conference, which was held in Canada for only the second time in 25 years.

Workshop topics dealing with the conference's theme of responding to a rapidly changing world included: Responding to Disaster: Lessons Learned from Sept. 11; Job Prospects Through 2003; Serving People with Special Needs in the Jewish Community; Refugee Settlement; and an in-depth look at the situation in Argentina.

Goldenberg said because Canada has a more liberal immigration policy than the United States, JVS and Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) plan to collaborate with their American counterparts to ensure "a smooth [journey] for those Argentinian Jews who do not elect to go to Israel.

"The Americans will help us because they realize it is easier to come here. They have staff in Argentina who will encourage people to come to Canada," Goldenberg said.

In another workshop, James Frank, vice-president and chief economist of the Conference Board of Canada, painted a bright economic picture.

In Canada, he said, although labour costs are rising and recruiting is "tough", unemployment rates are very low and youth are well-educated and eager to work.

Consumer confidence is on the rise, Frank said, but it is volatile. "People can change their minds very fast. Fears for jobs, a jump in interest rates, a drop in stock markets, a rise in terrorism, even rising gas prices can affect consumers at all income levels.

"Confidence affects willingness to borrow and/or spend from current income."

The inflation risk this year is a key business issue for banks and credit grantors, and automobile sales and financing will be under strain this year and next, Frank said.

"Housing costs are increasing, and a rise in interest rates starts raising affordability questions for first-time buyers."

A major social policy issue, he said, is how much public money should be spent on health and education, "never mind social welfare, public housing, or public transit and other public intrastructure. Health is a key underpinning of quality of life. Education, in general, is the key underpinning of a high income society."

The bottom economic line, said Frank, is that moving through 2002 and into 2003, "people can plan on the mood improving slowly. Disposable income growth is still good; business investment is improving a bit overall... and employment conditions are vastly improved."

Israel's stark reality experienced by Torontonians on UJA Federation Prime Minister's Mission

MEMBERS OF UJA FEDERATION'S week-long Prime Minister's Mission to Israel were recently dealt a harsh example of the reality faced by Israelis on an almost-daily basis.

Eighty members of the Toronto contingent were in their nearby Jerusalem hotel rooms when that day's vicious suicide bombing occurred early in the morning on a bus from Gilo. They were also in Israel when another suicide bomber struck at a bus stop in French Hill the next day and the following day when a Palestinian murdered members of a family in Itamar.

Understandably, mission participants were stunned, while at the same time, impressed with how the people of Israel handled the situation.

Carole Sterling, Vice Chair with Harvey Naglie of UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2003, and a participant on the mission, said, "It puts it all into perspective. Israelis do not want to be victimized and simply wish to be comfortable in the State of Israel. People here are making great sacrifices and we need to continue to show our support."

Sterling added that Israelis feel the need to continue living their lives as best they can. "They live in the moment despite the sadness surrounding events such as these. You go home at the end of the day and realize how important support for Israel is, both financially and otherwise."

Also on the mission were UJA Federation Campaign 2002 Chairs, Michael Bregman and David Koschitzky, who received this year's Keren Hayesod Yakir Award, presented to Jewish leaders for their outstanding contributions to Israel.

Keren Hayesod is the fundraising arm of the Jewish Agency, UJA Federation's overseas partner.

"The violence that occurred during our mission really brought home the reality of Israel's situation – the stress and anguish that Israelis live under each and every day. That's why these missions are so critical – to show our support," said Koschitzky.

Koschitzky's spirits were somewhat buoyed by the reception given to Prime Minister Ariel Sharon.

"I was definitely touched by the warmth and respect everybody there directed toward Sharon. It was truly wonderful to see this man being held in such high regard by everybody present," Koschitzky said.

Bregman spent much time speaking with Israelis on the street, and those conversations left their mark.

"I was struck by the enormous impact of terrorism on ordinary Israeli citizens," said Bregman. "Speaking with shopkeepers and taxi drivers usually left me with a lump in my throat, hearing of the daily life they were enduring. I can imagine nothing worse than having the lives of innocent loved ones, especially children, stolen by crazed suicide murderers. At the same time, there is an enormous sense of unity and commitment to survive."

The Prime Minister's Mission – chaired by Ronnie Appleby, Michael Buckstein, Stephen Goldhar and Howard Sokolowski — was one of UJA Federation's monthly solidarity trips to Israel.

Activities for this year's participants included a meeting with David Horovitz, editor of the Jerusalem Report, a visit to the Hadassah Hospital Trauma Centre just hours after the Gilo bus bombing, as well as breakfast with Rabbi Michael Melchior, Israel's Deputy Foreign Minister.

Participants also joined a strategic tour with senior military officials and visited an anti-terror IDF base where they met with Prime Minister Sharon during the Yakir Award ceremonies.

Where's the coverage of Syria?

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

With so much attention understandably focused on Israeli-Palestinian affairs, there has been a dearth of coverage of a potentially more explosive and destabilizing source of tension in the Mideast: Syria's increasingly provocative behaviour on Israel's northern border with Lebanon.

Syria, which controls Lebanon as a vassal state, has been aiding and abetting Hezbollah's escalating artillery attacks over the UN-certified border with Israel. And it does so in flagrant violation of UN Security Council Resolution 425, which calls for all states to recognize Lebanon's territorial integrity and independence, and for the Lebanese government to exercise its sovereign control of its southern region.

Here Hezbollah operates with impunity. Armed with approximately 800,000 rockets supplied by Iran, it poses a direct threat to Israel's major urban centres, occasionally fires upon Israel's northern communities, and frequently attacks Israeli aircraft flying within Israel's own airspace.

Syria's violation of Resolution 425 is even more blatant for one additionally compelling reason: Syria sits on the UN Security Council for a two-year term as a non-permanent member. In June, it even held the office of Security Council president.

Irony is too weak a word to describe this farcical situation. Syria remains on the U.S. State Department list as one of seven state sponsors of terrorism. The Syrian government harbours more than 10 terrorist organizations, including Hamas and Islamic Jihad, and backs their bombing attacks in Israel and in the territories.

In the meantime, Syrian Defence Minister Mustafa Tlass has authored a grossly anti-Semitic book Matzah of Zion, which claims that Jews used the blood of gentiles in preparing matzah. An Egyptian producer is currently planning to turn this blood libel into a movie. Syrian foreign minister Farouk Sharaa applauds Hezbollah for its "high sense of responsibility." And Syria's president Bashar Assad, who reportedly spends much of his day playing computer games, remains apparently oblivious to the dangers his country faces as he allows Hezbollah to act as it pleases.

Why hasn't there been more media coverage about Syria, Hezbollah and the dangers on the Lebanese-Israeli border? As the famous 18th-century philosopher Bishop Berkeley remarked, "To be is to be perceived." In modern media lingo, we might translate this as "Out of sight, out of mind." In short, if TV cameras aren't there to capture the story, for all intents and purposes, it just isn't happening. Contrast this lack of coverage with the incessant flood of images from the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

Nothing prevents journalists from travelling to northern Israel to report on what is happening at the border. Similarly, nothing prevents editorial writers and columnists from paying attention to this region as it sits on the brink of conflict. Such conflict will only be averted if Syria (and Iran) change course and rein in Hezbollah, which they do not seem inclined to do.

AJC pulls out of Nova Scotia Multicultural Festival

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Concern for the security of its staff and volunteers led the Atlantic Jewish Council to pull out of this year's Nova Scotia Multicultural Festival after festival officials denied council's request for dedicated security at the AJC booth.

AJC executive director Jon Goldberg said world events and recent anti-Semitic acts in Canada and elsewhere made him fear for the safety of people who would have staffed the booth at the 18-year-old, three-day fête, held in Halifax June 21 to 23.

He also told the Halifax Chronicle-Herald that material displayed last year by the Palestine Social Association (PSA) was unsuitable for the event's easygoing, harmonious theme, which celebrates ethnic diversity and promotes cultural awareness.

An AJC report produced after last year's festival said much of the information at the PSA table was "anti-Israel propaganda and some was even anti-Jewish, bordering on anti-Semitic," and said some Palestinian Canadians harassed a council representative.

"In good conscience, I couldn't put my staff and volunteers in the booth where I couldn't offer them security," Goldberg said.

Barbara Campbell, executive director of the Multicultural Association of Nova Scotia, said security was increased throughout the festival area, but posting a separate guard at, or behind, the CJC booth was not desirable. "That would give the wrong impression to everyone. This is our 18th year and we've never had so much as a fight."

Goldberg said he wasn't asking for an armed guard, a police officer or even a security guard. "There's a zillion volunteers around here who could have been enlisted."

He said "the AJC still supports the festival, but I'm saddened arrangements couldn't have been made to accommodate Jewish concerns.

"I'm quite upset we [weren't] there. We should be there."

Jawad Al-Nabulsi, an Acadia University student who worked at the PSA booth this year and last, told the Chronicle-Herald recently that last year someone affiliated with the Jewish pavilion raised the spectre of suicide bombings in the Middle East while Palestinian Canadians were answering visitors' questions about history and politics.

He said it's unfortunate the AJC decided to stay away this year and that if the Jewish community returns next year, perhaps the two groups' booths should be side by side.

"We're in Canada. We shouldn't be having these issues here," he said.

Goldberg said the AJC paid the festival's $150 entry fee for 2002 but pulled out after consulting with Canadian Jewish Congress in Ottawa. He said he received a refund and short letter of regret.

"I was having second thoughts. You know, you get a little nervous [about recent anti-Semitic episodes in Canada, plus world events]. I didn't want to put people [at the festival] in harm's way."

Goldberg said he checked out the PSA display on the festival's opening day. "I wasn't totally satisfied with their current display, with political buttons selling for $2 to promote the Palestinian cause."

The organizers issued an addendum to the festival's rules last May that warns exhibitors against "any derogatory activity. All cultural materials must be approved by festival staff prior to setup."

It said the festival reserves the right to remove offensive materials that run contrary to the spirit of its multicultural objectives.

Festival chair Mukhtyar Tomar said the addendum wasn't connected to last year's festival or relations between the AJC and the PSA. "It's just improvements."

Goldberg said the AJC isn't yet sure what it will do about next year's festival.

Jewish leaders back U.S. president's proposals

Italian Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi called on Arafat to resign as Palestinian leader.

"Many people are convinced that Arafat...should make a generous gesture and move aside. If I were President Arafat, I would make a grand gesture that would enable him to go down forever in history as the man who gave everything for the freedom of his country."

Berlusconi said that with a change in regime, "a huge line up of world forces [is] ready to help concretely and in a massive fashion."

On the domestic front, Rabbi Abraham Cooper, associate dean of the Los Angeles-based Simon Wiesenthal Center, lined up squarely behind Bush's plan. He said a regime change was necessary to provide Israel with a trustworthy party with whom to negotiate.

Under Arafat, Palestinian children are indoctrinated from a young age to hate and kill Israelis, he said.

He pointed to a Hamas Web site (www.jislamia.org/news/new04.htm) that recently celebrated kindergarten graduation by parading five-year-olds in military fatigues carrying plastic guns. One photo showed a youngster re-enacting the Ramallah lynching in which a mob tore apart Israeli reservists and proudly displayed the blood of their victims.

"This is the face of the future of the Palestinian people, unless they have enough guts to say, enough of the madness," Rabbi Cooper said.

Rabbi Cooper said the Bush plan was directed as much at G8 leaders and at the wider Arab world as it was at the Palestinians. It asks the Europeans to re-think their strategic views of the conflict. "Right now the Europeans are providing a blank cheque [to the Palestinian Authority], never mind political and moral cover," he said.

Rabbi Cooper said Canada could play a role in bridging the gap between the U.S. and European views and help bring the EU on board the American plan.

Wilder suggested Bush's plan would not have any impact on Arafat unless a united front lines up behind it.

"If Canada wants to be onside the United States and Israel,which I hope they will be, it's up to Canada to try to convince its Western European allies of the efficacy of this plan."

"The EU has been calling on America to do more, exercise its influence. Well this is it," Landy said. "Now they have to buy into it."

"Now that the road map has been set out, Canada has a role in building the consensus that is needed among the European and Arab nations," he added.

In the United States, meanwhile, the Conservative and Reform movements applauded the president's speech while other Jewish organizations also backed his peace plan.

"None of the Jewish community's anxieties [that Bush would unconditionally recommend formation of a Palestinian state] were realized," said Abraham Foxman, national director of the Anti-Defamation League.

David Harris, executive director of the American Jewish Committee, described Bush's call to oust Arafat as "historic."

"For the leader of the world's leading superpower to explicitly call for the Palestinian people to change their leadership is almost unprecedented," Harris said.

"He has essentially created a post-Oslo framework," said David Makovsky, senior fellow at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy. "He is making it clear that Palestinian aspirations for statehood are intertwined with reform and security."

Malcolm Hoenlein, executive vice-chair of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, said the European Union, Russia, the United Nations and others could no longer accuse the United States of not playing a leadership role, and blame Israel for the plight of Palestinians.

"It's not a reward for terrorism but a reward for the end of terrorism," Hoenlein said. "It's holding out hopes for a provisional arrangement and the ultimate possibility of a state, but conditioned on performance and meeting requirements."

Stephen Cohen, a national scholar for the Israel Policy Forum, said the three-year time frame that Bush envisioned to reach a Palestinian state is a "good goal line."

"We need far more direct American engagement in order to meet that goal," said Cohen, who joined Arab American leaders in calling for a more active U.S. role in resolving the conflict.

Despite the widespread support for the speech, some Jewish officials and analysts were concerned.

Bush's speech was "foolish" and "dead on arrival," Middle East analyst Daniel Pipes said.

Pipes said he did not believe the notion that Arafat is the cause of all of the Palestinians' problems and that reforming the Palestinian Authority would lead to peace.

He also called backing for a Palestinian state a "reward for terrorism."

David Zwiebel, the executive vice-president for government and public affairs for Agudath Israel of America, welcomed Bush's speech, but noted it did not address the "culture of hatred" that the Palestinian Authority has cultivated in Palestinian society.

Letty Cottin Pogrebin, author and past chair of Americans for Peace Now, said she believed the speech did not place enough pressure on Israel to relieve the hardships of the Palestinian people.

"I don't see where, if you were a Palestinian living with the barrel of an Israeli gun in front of you and tanks all around you, that you would see the light at the end of the tunnel here," she said.

LOTTERY OF LIFE

Moshe ben Maimon, known in more recent times as the Rambam or Maimonides, was a rabbi, physician and philosopher who lived from 1135 to 1204. He served as the court doctor to the sultan of Egypt. The Rambam was both brilliant and successful. Sadly, sometimes when someone is successful, others become jealous. The grand vizier of Egypt poisoned the mind of the sultan with hatred for Jews, and the Rambam's life was in danger…

Rabbi Moshe ben Maimon stood in front of the Egyptian sultan, flanked by royal guards. The grand vizier, seated at the ruler's side, arose and slowly walked toward the Rambam. In his hand was a small, ornate box containing two folded slips of paper. "One of these papers says 'LIFE' on it, and the other says 'DEATH,'" declared the sultan. "Choose one, and let your God decide your fate."

The Rambam looked at the grand vizier, who leered evilly at him, and realized what the Vizier's evil plan must be. He had written "DEATH" on both pieces of paper! What could he do? He thought for a moment, and an idea struck him.

As the courtiers silently watched, he picked one of the folded papers out of the box. Suddenly he announced, "I'm famished!"

He popped the paper into his mouth, chewed it up, and swallowed it.

Pandemonium broke loose. Everybody in the room began shouting in confusion. The Sultan looked utterly shocked. The vizier hissed, "What in the world do you think you're doing?"

"I'm sorry, I forgot to eat breakfast this morning. But if you want to know which slip I chose, just look at the other one!"

He reached into the box, and unfolded the remaining piece of paper. In its centre lay the word "DEATH." He held it up for everyone to see. "This one says 'DEATH.' The one I picked must have said 'LIFE!'"

And so the Rambam was saved… for now.

Palestinian schoolbooks 'fanning the flames of hatred'

Analysis

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

In the first years after the Oslo accords, discussions about Palestinian incitement against Israel were considered as borderline annoying, and the press did not take much interest in the subject. Bearing in mind Shimon Peres' prophecy of "a new Middle East," picking through Palestinian schoolbooks and listening to declarations made by senior Palestinian officials seemed an exhausting, if not completely irrelevant act.

However, the wave of violence seen in the last two years apparently proves otherwise. The suicide bomber does not reach Netanya and Hadera just because of the occupation and the people's desperation. Social ambience, some of it directed by the Palestinian Authority (PA) itself, some of it by Islamic organizations, also dictates his actions.

With this in mind, it might be worthwhile to examine the contents of Palestinian schoolbooks. According to an investigative report conducted recently by the IDF's West Bank and Gaza Strip liaison office, it appears that the main theme in the books is militant and nationalistic, far from recognizing the State of Israel as the partner for a "peace of the brave," as it was called by PA Chairman Yasser Arafat during the Oslo process.

The PA curriculum in the West Bank is based on Jordanian schoolbooks, while in the Gaza Strip, schoolbooks from Egypt are used. The Jordanian ones, which include many anti-Semitic and inciting expressions, were actually written by Palestinians solely for use in the West Bank education system. Since the start of the 2000 school year, the Palestinian education ministry has handed out its own books for the first and second grades, as well as for the fifth and sixth grades.

The investigation, led by Noah Meridor from the liaison office, examined 23 such books. It revealed "systematic education to delegitimize the existence of the State of Israel, fanning the flames of hatred and violent revenge to destroy the country."

The books express a lack of recognition of Israel, not even according to the 1967 borders, alongside adamant claims to Palestinian rule of all the land between the Jordan River and the Mediterranean Sea.

The Palestinians, the books claim, have first rights to the country. The "Arab Canaanites" were here before the Jews; therefore, the Zionist claims of rights to the land by virtue of their forefathers are a lie. Zionism is described as a movement in which the seizing of land is foremost among its tenets. The act of populating Israel, including inside the Green Line, is considered "settlement."

The adoption of the term "settlement" in this context, the liaison investigators state, means a total de-legitimization of Jewish cities in Israel, and as a result, Palestinian public opinion enthusiastically supports harming all settlers.

Israel is described as an evil country that exploits and degrades, where soldiers shoot merciful nurses, and Jews build scaffoldings. The exploitation and degradation are also accomplished by changing the names of Arab villages and cities, and by defacing and stealing Arab manuscripts.

The name Israel is missing from many maps of the region, which is termed entirely "Palestine" by the books. Cities such as Haifa, Afula and Jaffa are described as belonging to Palestine, while statistics regarding the size of Palestine use those relevant to Israel.

Important Changes to Immigration

Canada's New Immigration and Refugee Protection Act

What You Should Know

- Immigration Matters: Immigrants bring skills and commitment that help build Canada's economy and quality of life.
- A New Act: On June 28, 2002 the new Immigration and Refugee Protection Act becomes law. It continues Canada's tradition of welcoming people.
- Improving the Security of all Canadians: The new Act will protect us from those who take advantage of Canada's openness. In addition to the improved screening of new applicants, one of the key changes is a more secure, durable and convenient proof of residency card. This tamper-resistant plastic card replaces the previous paper document (IMM 1000). It is only for Permanent Residents (landed immigrants) living in Canada.
- Who will need the new Permanent Resident Card: "Permanent Residents" are people who have applied and been accepted to live in Canada. Starting December 31, 2003, Permanent Residents travelling outside of the country will need a Permanent Resident Card to re-enter Canada. Canadian citizens will not need this card.
- Becoming Canadians: Many Permanent Residents are qualified to become Canadian citizens. These people are encouraged to apply for their citizenship. If they succeed they will not need to apply for the new card.

Israel must foil regional nuclear arms plans, Mossad chief says

By AMIR OREN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel cannot spare any effort to foil, prevent or delay the attainment of weapons of mass destruction by countries like Iran, Iraq, Syria and Lybia, the head of Israel's Mossad said last week.

Speaking to a meeting of NATO's North Atlantic Council in Brussels, Mossad director, Ephraim Halevy, warned that radical Islamic terrorism as a whole, and suicide attacks in particular, pose a "formidable threat" to NATO member states whose "Muslim communities are rapidly developing and increasing in numbers and influence."

Halevy took the opportunity to harshly criticize Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat, who he says signs "an agreement with a view to violating it the moment circumstances would permit." The Palestinian leader is also maintaining his "traditional link" with Iraqi President Saddam Hussein, said Halevy.

The head of Israel's secret intelligence agency urges "appropriate behaviour" be a condition for any entity aspiring to nationhood and sovereignty.

The meeting took place behind closed doors and lasted for some three hours, beyond its allocated time. U.S. Ambassador to NATO, Nicholas Burns, quoted from U.S. President George W. Bush's speech last week, reiterating American support for Israel's right to defend itself, and speaking of the U.S. administration's duty to its ally.

The European ambassadors also spoke with sympathy for the Israeli victims of terror and demonstrated understanding for Israel's operation against terrorism, though they also spoke of the need for a political solution.

Participants at the meeting said it was an important opportunity for Israel to present its position, to convince foreign governments of the pressing need for global co-operation in the fight against terror, as well as understanding European opinions.

The most senior participant at the meeting was NATO's secretary-general, Lord George Robertson, with the chairman of the military committee, Italian Admiral Guido Venturoni, also in attendance. Israel's contingent was headed by its envoy to NATO and the European Union, Harry Kney-Tal. After Halevy's presentation, Brig.-Gen. Eival Gilady of the General Staff's planning branch presented the military aspects to battling terrorism.

Last week's meeting was part of NATO's annual round of political consultations with seven Mediterranean and North African countries, with this year's talks focusing on terrorism.

Halevy told the council the Mossad believes that Iran, despite denials by its defence minister, is investing heavily in developing long-range missiles with a range even beyond that of its Shihab-3, which is believed to have a range of 3,000 kilometres. He said Iran is researching and developing "missiles with longer ranges, which could reach Europe and in the future, even North America." He said he had "no reason to offer for this entry into such long-range development," nor did he know who and what the potential targets would be.

In addition, said Halevy, Iran is developing "weapon-grade nuclear capabilities" and pointed out that this activity, coupled with Iran's investment in delivery systems, "should be a subject of constant attention of everyone of us in this hall."

Ephraim Halevy

Iran's adherence to the Chemical Weapons Convention (CWC), Halevy believes, is nothing more than "a cover for the construction of a dual purpose civilian infrastructure which could be converted very speedily into production capabilities of large quantities of VX [gas]." In addition, Tehran is also carrying out research and development on biological warfare, according to the Mossad chief.

As to the dangers posed by Saddam Hussein, Halevy said one must assume Iraq had been trying to acquire nuclear capabilities ever since the United Nations' monitoring team was expelled in 1998.

"As you know, on the eve of the Gulf War, Iraq was on the verge of obtaining nuclear capability. They were months away from producing fissile material," he told the officials.

"We have clear indications that this has been and is their unswerving desire... We have partial evidence that they have renewed their production of VX and possibly anthrax. As to delivery systems, we have sufficient evidence to affirm that they are sparing no effort to preserve their residuary capabilities and to augment them with new ones."

Turning to Syria, Halevy said Israel had been "following [Syria's] acquisition and subsequent production of North Korean type Scud B, C and D missiles." He added most of the warheads are conventional, but "the Syrians also have B and C capabilities with relevance to surface-to-surface missiles." In addition, the Syrians have also produced Sarin (GB) nerve agents and are studying manufacturing VX nerve agents.

Halevy urged those present to keep a close eye on Libya, "which is developing long-range missiles with North Korean support," reminding them also that "Libya has often been mentioned as a country striving to achieve nuclear capability."

A significant part of Halevy's lecture was devoted to terrorism.

Suicide attacks, once "a marginal phenomenon characterizing the approach of a small extreme segment of society," are, he said, "rapidly evolving into a quasi-legitimate form of combat, encouraged and abetted at the leadership level in the Palestinian camp." The attacks on New York, Washington and Jerusalem are all "the fulfillment of a modus operandi motivated not only by its professional utility, but no less by its ideological and religious probity.

"The more these acts become prevalent," he warned, "the more the chance this will become a potent and prioritized weapon in future confrontations."

Halevy then called for "terrorism as a whole and suicide bombings in particular" to be recognized as a "form of war" which must be prohibited by international law. All those involved in such activities, or those who condone them, "must be placed outside the pale of justice." Halevy said he hoped "the days of rogue states and authorities acting as masters, not only of their own destiny, but also of yours and ours, must be numbered."

The PA was place alongside Syria, Iran and Iraq on his list of "host countries" that facilitate terrorist and suicide bombings. Halevy told the council how "Arafat has placed the theme of the suicide bomber – the martyr, the shaheed – at the top of his priorities."

He also warned of Iran's increasing support for terrorism, and its growing influence over the PA, with the Karine A arms ship affair serving as a prominent example.

In closing, Halevy said terrorism and suicide bombings can only be practised if "there is a safe haven for training, planning and the procurement of weaponry." He said states and individual leaders are responsible for what goes on in areas under their control.

"Ultimately, the international community will have no option but to force them to be accountable. Otherwise, the whole international system of nation-states exercising their sovereignty over land and people will be in jeopardy."

Israel's evidence convinces Bush

Washington is planning to dispatch Undersecretary of State for Near East Affairs William Burns to the region to sound out Middle East leaders on their reactions to the speech and how to move forward. A trip by U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell may follow the Burns trip, while other reports suggest Powell may convene a mini-summit of regional foreign ministers and a Palestinian Authority representative in New York in September during the annual UN General Assembly meeting.

A senior government source in Jerusalem said last week that the Americans face two problems in organizing a summit: what to do about Syria and Lebanon, and competition between Egypt and Saudi Arabia over the leading Arab role.

Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, meanwhile, has resumed contacts with top PA officials through his aides. In a meeting with EU ambassadors last week, Peres said the Bush speech "presented Labor's strategy with Likud tactics." He did not say whether he believes Arafat will be the sole candidate, or will be re-elected, in the Palestinian elections, which the PA announced last week will take place in January.

The PA said as it unveiled its own reform plans last week that the changes were prepared irrespective of Bush's speech. At a press conference in Jericho, Minister of Local Authorities Sa'eb Erekat announced the recently shuffled PA cabinet's "100-day plan." He said the reforms began on June 12 and were formally approved by Arafat on June 22, two days before the speech.

According to the plan, the Palestinian cabinet is committed to "immediately begin" steps to implement the principle of separation of powers, though the plan does not detail which steps will be taken. It says that within seven days, an order will be given to attach the preventive security forces, the Palestinian police and the civil defence forces to the PA's Interior Ministry. By September, new, "appropriate" judges must be appointed to strengthen the judiciary, and all the official information agencies, as well as the Information and Cultural Ministry, will be unified into one body. By Nov. 1, the Palestinian Legislative Council must receive the PA's 2003 budget.

The prologue to the reform package emphasizes its political goals, such as "strengthening the steadfastness of the people against the Israeli occupation," and says the new cabinet condemns "any sort of violence and threats to the lives of innocent Palestinian and Israeli civilians... creates an atmosphere of hostility, hatred and despair in Israeli society."

Erekat said last week it was too early to say if Arafat would run for re-election, but Nabil Sha'ath said in Cairo that Arafat would run, warning that open democratic elections could yield a Hamas majority in the Palestinian Legislative Council. Sha'ath's comments angered Information Minister Yasser Abed Rabo, who told TV interviewers that Sha'ath should stick to speaking about ending the occupation.

Oslo's dead – now what?

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Yitzhak Rabin, under whose premiership the 1993 Oslo accords were signed, must be rolling in his grave. Last week, as the Israeli army reoccupied all but one major town in the West Bank after another sickening spate of Palestinian suicide bombings, Rabin's daughter, Dalia Rabin-Pelosoff, the deputy defence minister in Ariel Sharon's cabinet, made it official. Oslo, she declared without mincing words,"no longer exists."

Mideast Analysis

Oslo, the agreement that held out the hope of a historic rapprochement between Zionism and Palestinian nationalism, died a death of a thousand blows – hammered by Palestinian terrorism and incitement and pummelled by Israeli settlement expansion and failure to honour withdrawal schedules.

The net result is that Israel and the Palestinians have lost all trust in each other, setting back the clock to the pre-Oslo era, when even the idea of peace was a remote possibility.

Oslo was buffeted by the collapse of the Camp David summit and the outbreak of the second Palestinian uprising, which has turned into an undeclared war and shattered Israel's bilateral ties with the Palestinian Authority (PA). But ultimately, Oslo was destroyed by the suicide bombings – which have killed 64 Israelis since June 5, the 35th anniversary of the Six Day War – and by PA Chairman Yasser Arafat's unwillingness or inability to stop them.

Shocked by these indiscriminate assaults, which have battered its economy and darkened its national mood, Israel has taken several significant steps to seal itself off from the plague of Arab bombers.

In what is being dubbed Operation Determined Path, Israel has stormed back into the West Bank for what will probably be a prolonged stay, and it has threatened to recapture the Gaza Strip.

Israel resorted to this radical measure when it became clear that Operation Defensive Shield, launched on March 29 after the Passover massacre in Netanya that killed 29 Israelis, had not had the desired effect of thwarting terrorism or crippling the organizations, from Hamas to the Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades, behind it.

In a seminal policy speech last week, U.S. President George W. Bush, who had previously criticized Israel's incursions into Palestinian autonomous areas, defended what he described as Israel's "right of self-defence."

Buoyed by Washington's empathy, and Bush's demand for a new, reformed Palestinian leadership untainted by terrorism and corruption, Israel intensified its sweep into the West Bank, promising a "decisive and crushing" response to Palestinian bombings.

It remains to be seen whether a reoccupation of the West Bank, which postpones a resolution of Israel's conflict with the Palestinians and stymies momentum toward the establishment of a Palestinian state, can eradicate terrorism. It may inflame Palestinian grievances and thus be counter-productive. Nevertheless, Israel cannot sit back and do nothing in the face of murderous attacks on its citizens.

After much debate, Israel has begun building a fortified fence roughly along the old Green Line (as well as around Jerusalem). The path of the fence, bolstered by ditches, sensors and patrol roads, often veers eastward into the West Bank to protect settlements, as well as to avoid disadvantageous topography and make way for Sharon's previously announced buffer zones.

Opposed by Jewish settlers in the West Bank who fear it will demarcate Israel's future border and by Palestinians who object to any unilateral actions, the fence lays bare at least two political realities. It is a tacit admission that settlements beyond the Green Line do not, in fact, add to Israel's security, and it implies that Israel, having broken off talks with the Palestinians, is heading toward unilateral separation from them.

Israel has also started to clamp down on Palestinians who sneak into the country from the West Bank and has made it illegal for Palestinian workers to be employed by West Bank settlements. These measures may be helpful in the short run, but they are no substitute for a credible political process that addresses core Arab-Israeli issues.

The Week in Israel

June 24

• As part of a broader sweep back into areas in the West Bank, the IDF surrounded Yasser Arafat's headquarters in Ramallah.

June 25

• Attorney-General Elyahkim Rubinstein ruled that the public call by the Moledet party for a voluntary transfer of Arabs from Israel to neighbouring states was not illegal although definitely immoral.

• Israel's new Arabic-English international satellite TV network premiered, featuring a half-hour English news program and eight hours of daily Arabic broadcasts.

June 26

• About 150 Palestinian gunmen surrendered to IDF troops who had surrounded Palestinian Authority headquarters in Hebron. Among the 150 were 20 Palestinians wanted by Israel for suspected terror acts against Israelis.

June 27

• Israel cannot exile Palestinian suicide bombers' families to other countries, Rubinstein said. But he did not rule out the possibility of moving the families from the West Bank to the Gaza Strip, as proposed at a recent cabinet meeting.

June 28

• Some 15 per cent of the water pumped from the coastal aquifer, Israel's second most important reservoir, is unfit for drinking, according to a new report released by the Hydrology Service. Almost 60 per cent of the water, though potable, does not meet the service's standards for "high quality," the report adds. The report strengthens fears that the coastal aquifer is steadily deteriorating.

Film spurs debate about homosexuality, proud director says

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Trembling Before G-D has been setting box office records in the United States and Sandi Simcha DuBowski, its youthful director, could not be more pleased.

The path-breaking film, which took six years and $900,000 (US) to make, has grossed $700,000 (US) and is expected to generate at least $1 million in revenues, a staggering sum for a documentary.

Financial considerations aside, what gratifies the 31-year-old DuBowski most is that the film, the first to explore the relationship between Jewish homosexuals and lesbians and the chassidic and Orthodox communities, has played a major role in fostering a debate about the topic.

"It's put the issue squarely on the table," he said in an interview on a cool and rainy day in early May. "It can't be swept under the rug anymore."

Trembling Before G-D, which has garnered positive reviews and which opens in Toronto on July 19 at the Carlton and Canada Square theatres, has been the object of much criticism in the Orthodox community, given the community's traditional opposition to homosexuality and lesbianism.

For example: In Baltimore, Orthodox Jews, joined by evangelical Christians, staged protests. And in Mexico City, pressure was brought to bear on the Jewish community centre not to show it.

But Trembling Before G-D has not been universally condemned by Orthodox Jews, claimed DuBowski, a white kippah resting on his head of hair.

Fourteen Orthodox synagogues in the United States, Canada and Britain have either screened it or plan to in the near future. And a Jewish day school in Philadelphia – Akiva Hebrew Academy – recently showed it to its 11th and 12th graders.

More significantly, the Rabbinical Council of America has invited DuBowski to screen it at its annual convention. "This," he declared, "is a milestone."

Not surprisingly, Trembling Before G-D has encouraged gay Orthodox Jews to come out of the closet. "Waves of people are coming out. I got a phone call this morning from a guy who told me he's come out."

The ripple effects have also led to belated family reunifications, he believes.

In Orthodox circles, gays, if not ridiculed, shunned or disowned by family and friends, are usually forced to submit to psychological treatment or arranged marriages.

The results, judging by some of the painful interviews in the movie, can be disastrous.

DuBowski, who came out when he was 18, said Orthodox gays who confess to their "sin" can do one of two things.

They can leave the community and embrace non-Orthodox forms of Judaism, which are generally more open to homosexuality and lesbianism. "I know hundreds and hundreds of people who've done that," he said.

Or they can get married and adopt the trappings of a "normal" life. He explained: "In the chassidic and haredi worlds, most gays exercise that option. It's very hard to live as a single person in these communities. There is unbelievable pressure to marry."

Sandi Simcha DuBowski

In making this film, DuBowski, above all else, sought to put a human face on what is otherwise an abstract issue in the Orthodox community. Judging by the poignant stories he tells, he has succeeded.

Naively, perhaps, he is hopeful that the Orthodox community is capable of altering its generally monolithic view of homosexuality and lesbianism.

"If I didn't believe that, I wouldn't have made the movie. I don't believe the Orthodox community can't respond to the suffering of a Jewish heart and can't meet such a level of pain."

Realistically, he realizes that Trembling Before G-D will not resolve any halachic issues. Nevertheless, he takes solace from his meetings with compassionate Orthodox rabbis, some of whom told him there are no explicit prohibitions against homosexuality and lesbianism in the Torah.

DuBowski was raised in a Conservative household in Brooklyn, N.Y., the only child of Elliot and Rima DuBowski.

Ravel's Dance Like a Butterfly highlight of Fringe Festival

By BEN ROSE
Special to The CJN

This year's annual Toronto Fringe Festival runs July 3-14. Here are highlights of some of the plays involved:

The hardships of an 85-year-old Jewish woman as she tries to retain her independence are told in Dance Like a Butterfly by renowned Montreal playwright Aviva Ravel at Tarragon Extra Space theatre.

The compassionate and touching tale is performed by Lisa Hurd, of St. John's, Nfld., who was born in Vienna. She has already performed Dance Like a Butterfly over 50 times, in Saint John, Halifax, Toronto and Peterborough, and plans to present it in the fall in Newfoundland and on Vancouver Island.

•An unusual, but sympathetic account of a dentist's life, is the raison d'etre of a play by Gideon Forman at the Tarragon Extra Space theatre. Death of My Dentist, explores the inner life of a dentist, who comes back from the grave, to sum up his life and laments the isolation of his later years when he no longer practices.

The Jewish playwright has had other unusual themes in plays at the Alumnae Theatre and Summerworks Festival.

"I may tell my own dentist that I've written this play. He is very much alive and I don't mind him. But the play is really about the difficulties men of my father's generation have in making friends in their old age." Forman said.

•In Criminal Hearts, at the Poor Alex, actor Chloe Ariane Whitehor, breaks into an apartment, but finds that the stuff she intended to steal, has already been taken away by the tenant's divorced husband. So she becomes friendly with Ata, the tenant, and the two decide to carry on with a life of crime.

"There is some coarse language and this is definitely not for children," Whitehor said..

The Fishbowl Theatre, of which she is founder and artistic director, is making its first appearance at The Fringe.

•One of the Fringe efforts is a satire on the reality survivor shows which have had great success on TV lately. In this case, it takes place in Radcliffe, a fictional prison, with 10 people in a game show, who are free to come and go, while mixing with the other inmates. The reward is $1 million to the last person, who survives the atmosphere, and leaves the prison.

Then the same actors who appeared in Radcliffe come back on stage for Minotauk Falls, a parody on a TV sitcom, celebrating its 100th episode.

The two plays, which run about 35 minutes each, are written, produced and directed by two brothers, Steven and Daniel Shihori, and staged in the Renaissance Room behind the Clinton Tavern.

HONG KONG — My first impression of Hong Kong, from the picture window of the fabled Peninsula Hotel, was of its gleaming skyline under a pale sun.

Although I was still jet-lagged, having just arrived from Toronto after a long flight on Cathay Pacific, Hong Kong's flagship airline, I was struck by the sheer magnificence of the ultra-modern cityscape in my line of vision.

The skyscrapers, rising like monoliths along scenic Victoria Harbour, whetted my appetite for more. This was a city whose attractions I wanted to experience, my fatigue notwithstanding.

In the next few days, I explored Hong Kong, unpeeling its multifaceted layers and discovering an appealing, pulsating blend of Manhattan and Chinatown.

Once a somnolent fishing village defined in part by its salt flats and incense trees, Hong Kong was a British colony from 1842 to 1997 and is now a semi-autonomous special administrative region of the People's Republic of China.

Under colonial rule, it matured into a centre of international finance and commerce and a gateway to the untapped riches of China. Five years after its handover to mainland China, Hong Kong is what it was during British times – an affluent and industrious city state.

To appreciate and fully understand its place in China and the world, a visit to the impressive Hong Kong Museum of History, which opened last year, is necessary.

Accompanied by my guide, Nevin Lim, I traced Hong Kong's social, economic and political development from Neolithic times to the present day.

I saw ancient pottery and arrowheads and 19th century wedding gowns and lacquered boxes, learned about the Opium Wars that ushered in the British era, examined models of a traditional Chinese pharmacy, looked at exhibits relating to the short-lived Japanese occupation and the postwar period and finished the tour by studying mementos from the 1997 handover.

Hong Kong consists of four distinct parts: Hong Kong Island, where the central business district and many of its finest hotels and shopping malls are located; Kowloon, a major tourist mecca on the northern side of the harbour; the fan-shaped New Territories, its rural hinterland; and the islands and islets in the South China Sea, many of them uninhabited.

The vast majority of visitors concentrate on Hong Island Island and Kowloon, a peninsula connected to the Chinese mainland. Both are impossibly crowded and visually stimulating, particularly at night, when large and small garish neon signs, in Chinese characters, light up the streets in a brilliant display of colour.

Although Hong Kong is synonymous with sleek modernity, you can still find nooks and crannies from its storied past.

In Aberdeen's Shum Wan harbour, the remnants of a fishing fleet, once so vital to the local economy, lie placidly at anchor, an impenetrable wall of high-rise condominiums on either side of the channel. Close by is the Jumbo, which bills itself as the world's largest floating restaurant.

Hong Kong Park, a serene redoubt squeezed between immense commercial buildings soaring luminously into the sky, is the site of the white-columned Flagstaff House Museum of Tea Ware. Formerly the residence of the commander of the British forces, Flagstaff House is an exemplar of Greek Revival architecture and is Hong Kong's oldest surviving colonial structure.

Murray House, a restored colonial building, is on the periphery of Stanley, a maze of shops and stalls where bargaining is king.

Graham Street, an open-air fruit and vegetable market in the shadow of mighty skyscrapers, is a throwback to the 19th century.

The Star Ferry, which links Kowloon to Hong Kong Island, has lost some of its utility since the advent of the subway system. But the seven-minute ride across the choppy waters of Victoria Harbour, dotted with bobbing tugboats, barges and the rare sampan, is an exercise in nostalgia.

Luk Yuu, one of only two traditional Chinese tea houses still left in Hong Kong, is certainly worth a visit, as is the Repulse Bay Hotel, known for its sedate afternoon tea.

No sojourn in Hong Kong would be complete without sampling the shopping, which is fabulous. The sales, now in full swing, will last until Aug. 31.

Discerning buyers can head to luxurious air-conditioned malls and elegant department stores in Causeway Bay.

Alternatively, they can cruise the glittering shops on Nathan Road, named after an early 20th century Jewish governor-general. On Nathan Road, I returned repeatedly to Yue Hwa Chinese Products Emporium, whose food and tea section in the basement is amazing.

While we're on the subject of tea, I suggest a stopover at Ming Heung Tea Import & Export on Hau Wong Road. On the shelves in silver bins are a medley of fine teas, from green and white to yellow and black, the most expensive of which is $32,000 (Hong Kong) for a package of 600 grams.

On Hollywood Road, I ambled in and out of intriguing antique and curio shops. At one store, Dragon Culture, I picked up a copy of Collecting Chinese Antiquities, written by Victor Choi, the erudite proprietor.

Walking along Queen's Road West, I popped into aromatic herbal tea, ginseng and bird's nest shops.

The Temple Street Night Market and Mong Kok bulge with reasonably priced garments, accessories, watches and souvenirs. The Jade Market, jammed with 450 stalls, specializes in jade of all types, from genuine to faux.

Having done my shopping, I stopped at the Hong Kong Museum of Art, which faces Hong Kong's bristling skyline.

Its eclectic collection of Chinese watercolours, spare calligraphy and stylized ceramics is superb and mesmerizing. There are reproductions in the gift shop.

An ideal way of ending a day in Hong Kong is with an ascent to Victoria Peak, preferably by cable car. At 396 metres, it's the city's highest point, and offers a wonderful view of Hong Kong, which, by any measure, is the jewel of the Orient.

Film spurs lively debate

When he was 11 or 12, he began having crushes on boys, a sure sign of his sexual orientation. At 18, he told his mother he was gay.

It was, as he recalls, an extremely emotional encounter.

"She cried and hugged me. She couldn't eat or sleep for several days after that. She told my father, who was not too happy either. But they've come a long way since then."

His parents, he added, are proud of Trembling Before G-D. "It has helped them. They're shepping naches. They see it doing good, doing tikkun olam."

DuBowski, who considers himself an Orthodox Jew, said that Trembling Before G-D, which set him on the path of greater religious observance, is his first full-length feature. Eight years ago, he made a short video, Tomboychik, about his grandmother.

He was drawn to making Trembling Before G-D for a number of reasons, his own personal inclinations being one of them.

"It was clear that it could be a vehicle not just of personal exploration, but a powerful catalyst for the birth of a community that would gain a mass public voice for the first time."

He approached about 100 foundations for funds, but received a positive response from only 25.

The hardest part was finding interviewees. "Of 50 rebbitzens, female mental health professionals and teachers, only one agreed to talk," he disclosed.

David, a modern Orthodox Jew, pulled out several times, fearful of embarrassing his family. But in the end, he agreed to co-operate, and became one of the central and most empathetic figures in the film.

DuBowski, who has been travelling the world publicizing his film, said that town-hall discussion forums and a Shabbaton will accompany the opening of Trembling Before G-D in Toronto.

Business Profile

Business problems require common sense, author says

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Common sense, Barry Siskind will tell you, is a quality all entrepreneurs need.

As he warms to the topic, he mentions bumblebees.

Yes, bumblebees.

Let him tell the story.

About 100 years ago, scientists concluded that bumblebees are aerodynamically incapable of flight, given the ratio of their body weight to their wing span.

Yet, as we all know, bumblebees can and do fly, flighty scientific theories to the contrary.

"When bumblebees ignore science and take off in flight, they're using common sense," he writes in Bumblebees Can't Fly (Stoddart), a Canadian bestseller published recently in the United States and due to be published in Spain, Portugal, India, South Korea and Romania.

"We, too, have been blessed with common sense," he adds. "We use it when the solution to a problem seems so obvious and right that no other course of actions seems possible. More often than not, however, we don't use this valuable commodity in our lives."

Common sense, Siskind's mantra, is the topic of the book, which took seven years to research, write and market, and is a quintessential primer based on his experiences and those of others.

"I'm not sure anyone can write a book of strategies like Bumblebees in the vacuum of your own head without the input of hundreds of people," explained Siskind, the president of International Training and Management, one of North America's largest trade and consumer show companies. "I listened, talked and took notes."

In Bumblebees, Siskind shows how to deploy your common sense – how to recognize it, harness it and put it to good use.

As he defines it, common sense is the ability to find the right solution to the right problem at the right time.

"The right solution is the one that works best, the one that is the most straightforward or the easiest to implement," said Siskind, who works out of Terra Cotta, Ont. "It sounds simple, right? So why is it often so difficult to come up the proper solution?"

Siskind, who was born and raised in London, Ont., wrote Bumblebees because he is fascinated by the process of decision-making.

"I've watched people make decisions and often wondered how really smart people do really dumb things," observed Siskind, who is also a professional speaker and business writer. "They find themselves on the wrong track and don't know how to reverse the downward spiral."

Having realized that what is appropriate for one person or business may not necessarily be right for another, he came to the conclusion that the missing ingredient was, wonder of wonders, good old-fashioned common sense.

"I thought that if I could find a way to help people incorporate more common sense into their everyday decision-making, it could be of tremendous value to my clients."

No problem, he maintains, defies common sense.

As he put it, "There are good solutions out there for everything, even though we don't initially know it."

Siskind has devised seven common-sense strategies:

Doubt the obvious.

This strategy helps you broaden your horizons and teaches you to see new possibilities.

"Often we take what we hear for granted and assume these messages are true: There will never be peace in the Middle East. The sun revolves around the earth. When we take statements like these at face value, there is no point going any further."

Let your reach exceed your grasp.

"There are answers out there for everything, and even though you may not see them now, they are there nevertheless.

"For example: Scientists have been searching for a cure to cancer for decades, but you don't see them throwing up their hands and saying, 'What's the use, there isn't an answer.' On the contrary, they know any answer lies out there, they just don't know what it is and when they will stumble over it."

Know yourself.

Every action is governed by four life forces – values, intellect, emotion and experience.

Barry Siskind, author of Bumblebees Can't Fly

"The trick is to honour all four forces and move as close to the centre as possible. This is also a terrific strategy for helping groups reach consensus."

Transform information into knowledge.

"We're inundated with information. The trick is to transform it into workable knowledge at a gut level. This implies that we can instinctively incorporate common sense into everyday decision-making. Intuition can be honed using three guiding principles: sense of purpose, commitment and inner strength."

Embrace the unexpected.

"This strategy allows us to find new, workable solutions in the most unlikely of places."

Stay the course.

This strategy advises when to backtrack and when to move forward. "It teaches you how to retrace your steps and find where you went off course."

Don't be afraid to change horses in midstream.

"Sometimes, we make bad decisions, but that doesn't mean we are stuck. There are always ways of correcting what is bad. This strategy takes the discussion on intuition one step further by identifying the three voices of intuition: the thinker, the doer and the critic."

If followed in sequence, these strategies are foolproof, Siskind claimed.

And they lend themselves perfectly to business.

"Successful businesses are run by managers and employees who possess a healthy dose of common sense," he noted.

Siskind, whose grandfather was a founder of one of London's synagogues, has travelled the world for the past two decades helping firms mount trade and consumer shows.

He has also written more than 500 magazine and newspaper stories about such shows.

As a speaker, Siskind usually delivers talks on exhibiting excellence. "In addition, I assist people put the buzz back into their organizations with the principles learned in Bumblebees."

Now 55, he is the son of the late Jack Siskind and his wife, Esther, a real estate agent.

"In London, I was part of a large family that played a major role in the Jewish community," he said. "Strong Jewish feelings have never really left me and, now, as a grandfather, I feel a strong pull back into the Jewish community."

Mental health art contest draws over 6,500 kids

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

More than 6,500 children from kindergarten to Grade 8 took part in the first Drawing for Our Dream Art Competition, sponsored by the Centre for Addiction and Mental Health.

Children participating in this year's contest drew pictures responding to: "What makes you feel good about yourself?" or "Draw Happy!"

Students from the Toronto Heschel School and Bialik, United Synagogue, Associated Hebrew and Leo Baeck day schools were among the 180 winners. They received prizes that included passes to local attractions, a tour of the Cadbury Trebor Allan factory, art sets, Ganz antique teddy bears, gift certificates, videos and toys.

Each child who entered received a set of Sandylion stickers and a letter of acknowledgement.

Jean Simpson, chief operating officer of the Centre for Addiction and Mental Health (formerly the Clarke Institute), said people at the centre saw a need to create awareness of mental health issues, particularly among children.

The hope is, she told The CJN, that this greater awareness will "lessen the stigma of mental illness and addictions."

Contest organizers approached Toronto District School Board, Toronto Catholic School Board, UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education and Mentor College for their co-operation, which, Simpson said, was freely given. Through media advertising, the general public was also approached.

Simpson and the other organizers were "astounded" by the response, she said. In less than a month, hundreds of entries were received, as well as donations by private and corporate sponsors.

Some schools combined taking part in the contest with teaching units on mental illness, while others displayed the entries around the school to stimulate interest.

There were 16 judges, including sponsor representatives, artists, education specialists, two general volunteers, and a child psychologist.

Simpson explained that the centre has a number of programs specifically for children, including an arson prevention program, an adolescent/young offender program, a gender identity service and programs for such behavioural problems as aggression, substance abuse and anxiety.

This is in addition to the better-known programs dealing with psychiatric conditions, such as obsessive compulsive disorder, attention deficit hyperactivity disorder and psychoses. Some of the services are offered jointly with the Hospital for Sick Children, with joint faculty appointments.

A chilling note Simpson added is that "more children die of suicide than from cancer and heart disease combined." Even more chilling is the statistic that 20 per cent of youngsters need the kinds of help the centre provides, yet of those, 80 per cent don't get any.

Part of the reason for the contest, she said, is to remove the feelings of shame and denial that frequently go along with mental illness, so that people will be prepared to get the help that they need.

Plans are to make the competition an annual event, with a different theme every year. The schools, Simpson said, have expressed willingness to incorporate it into a regular classroom unit on mental health.

MDA remains on Israel's front line

By JEFF BERCUSON
Special to The CJN

Despite Israel's recent political instability, the staff of Magen David Adom (MDA) is still passionately focused on its goals, says a veteran of emergency medicine in both Israel and Canada.

Dr. Isser Dubinsky, the vice-president of Miltom Consulting Inc. and an associate professor in the department of family and community medicine at University of Toronto, was talking as the keynote speaker for a recent information session sponsored by MDA and the Canadian chapter of the Israel Medical Association.

The event, called How Magen David Adom Responds to the Current Crisis, outlined MDA's history and achievements and included a frank discussion about the difficulties it's now facing.

Increased activity reported

"In the year 2000 alone, MDA required the use of 78,000 mobile ICU transfers, an increase of nearly 40 per cent," Dubinsky said.

The organization has also seen an increase of 14 per cent in its activity, most of which can be attributed to the increase in the number of suicide bombings throughout Israel, he said.

Last year, the staff of MDA was also devastated by the deaths of three of its volunteers at the hands of suicide bombers.

Since its inception in 1930 – when seven Israeli doctors from Tel Aviv operated out of a one-room emergency treatment facility – MDA has grown in size and importance. With a fleet of 581 ambulances operating 24 hours a day, seven days a week, its staff of physicians, volunteers and Haganah members is responsible for caring for and transporting more than 230,000 patients each year.

The organization, often considered the State of Israel's second line of defence, was awarded the University of Haifa's Humanitarian Award for Merit last month.

MDA saves lives regardless of religion, sex or race, in times of peace, in emergencies and during war, Dubinsky said.

He recalled that once while he was working in the emergency unit of Jerusalem's Hadassah Hospital, a 17-year-old Palestinian boy was brought into his care after a bomb he was building in his basement was accidentally detonated, leaving him with third degree burns covering nearly 70 per cent of his body.

Despite the boy's harmful intentions, the staff of MDA provided him with the best possible care, Dubinsky said.

"Magen David Adom does not recognize any boundaries or borders. It responds to every call with an equal amount of calm, dispatch and care," Dubinsky said.

Because of its shoestring budget, MDA relies heavily on volunteers – what Dubinsky calls the "human factor" – who he commended for their willingness to "take risks and chances and share in the ambiguity of daily life in Israel."

Dubinsky ended his talk on an optimistic note.

"The way to the Promised Land has never been an easy one, but thanks to the Magen David Adom, the path to the Holy Land, the land of milk and honey, has been made a little easier."

In a question-and-answer period following the speech, a member of the audience who is currently completing a degree in medicine and who had participated in the MDA volunteer program, said the experience was "a wonderful way to give back to the community."

It has "a huge impact on the formative years of the students that participate in Magen David Adom," the audience member said.

For more information on MDA, visit the organization's Web site at www.magendavidadom.org, or call the Canadian Chapter of the Israel Medical Association at 416-781-9562.

Book a celebration of Matt Cohen and his work

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Uncommon Ground, a fresh collection of articles, essays, excerpts and interviews just published by Knopf Canada ($29.95), offers a wonderfully luminescent look into the legacy of the multifaceted and elusive Canadian writer Matt Cohen, who died in December 1999.

The book is being offered as a festschrift, or celebration, of Cohen and his work. It features pieces from a diverse assortment of Cohen's literary associates and friends, including Margaret Atwood, George Bowering, John Irving, Martin Levin and Alice Munro. Its fascinating historical material includes seven interviews conducted over the course of Cohen's prolific, three-decade-long writing career.

Born in Kingston and raised in Ottawa, Cohen later lived in Toronto. He became famous for his five Salem books, which occur in and around a fictitious village in eastern Ontario.

He left a sizeable oeuvre of more than 20 books, mostly novels such as The Sweet Second Summer of Kitty Malone (1979), The Spanish Doctor (1984) and Elizabeth and After (1999); the latter title earned him a Governor General's Award just before he died. He also wrote numerous children's books under the cuddly pseudonym Teddy Jam. An autobiography, Typing: A Life in 26 Keys, appeared posthumously in 2000, as did an anthology of short stories, Getting Lucky.

While Cohen sometimes dabbled in Jewish themes and characters, he defied being pigeonholed as a Jewish writer. When his first significantly Jewish work (The Spanish Doctor) appeared, critics treated it as an aberration and pleaded with him to resume his usual Canadian literary output. It was, Cohen observed, as if being Jewish and being Canadian were mutually exclusive qualities. In that light, he is a pioneer of the current multicultural trend in Canadian fiction.

"Matt was to become one of the leaders of the movement to decolonize Canadian literature, to give it a voice of its own," writes translator Daniel Poliquin.

The Spanish Doctor came as a shock to many readers and critics, Cohen told an interviewer in 1990, "because of their sense that I betrayed my Canadianness by writing about being Jewish. It tells you something uncomfortable about people's conception of what it means to be a Canadian. Even after Nadine was published, people would say to me: 'Are you going to write about Canada again?' I would answer that most of Nadine takes place in Canada, and that her being Jewish doesn't mean she isn't Canadian. Then they would be offended, as if I'd made a hostile remark."

Atwood astutely suggests a connection between Cohen's Jewish background and "the crumbling WASP rurals of the Ottawa Valley" that Cohen focused on in the Salem series: "Nobody seemed to understand the affinity between Jews and crumbling rurals – the common threads, which were destroyed culture, demoralization, and rootless and wandering survivors."

Atwood also provides a significant insight by noting that Cohen was not simply a literary realist, since he dipped frequently into the realm of the fabulous in books such as Last Seen (1996).

"Tale-spinning improvisation and the invention of wild fantasies came to him easily; it was the 'realism' that was hard work," she writes.

Editor Anna Porter, who presents a charming sketch of her relationship with Cohen, observes that he was disappointed that his books, while critically successful, did not make him a comfortable living "nor did they change anyone's life." As Porter observes, "Matt remained his own harshest critic."

Each chapter of Uncommon Ground seems to illuminate another facet of the writer we thought we knew. Alice Munro rhapsodizes over Kitty Malone; Steven Hayward details Cohen's connection to a Toronto bookshop, highlighted in the 1993 novel The Bookseller; Janet Lunn tells us about the children's writer; Beatriz Hausner's provides a thorough, descriptive bibliography that deftly summarizes Cohen's multiple gifts to our national literature.

Another facet: Cohen was fascinated with the European-Jewish writer Joseph Roth, and intended to write a novel about him called The Three Loves of Joseph Roth. Uncommon Ground presents a seven-page segment from the unfinished manuscript.

Edited by Graeme Gibson, Wayne Grady, Dennis Lee and Priscila Uppal, Uncommon Ground is the Canlit establishment's loving tribute to one of its own – no matter how far out of the mainstream he perceived himself to be. The book is required reading for anyone who wants to get a handle on Cohen, whose reputation will likely grow in the years ahead.

Smashnova eliminated from Wimbledon

CJN News Services

Israeli tennis star Anna Smashnova was upset by French Open junior champion Angelique Widjaja in straight sets at Wimbledon last week.

The 17-year-old Widjaja, playing for the first time in the main draw, came away a 6-3, 6-2 winner against 25-year-old Smashnova, who has won three of her five women's tennis titles this year and was seeded 15th at Wimbledon.

Widjaja jumped into a 4-0 lead against Smashnova before the Israeli broke back and narrowed the gap to 4-2 in the first set, but Widjaja steeled her nerves to take the match.

Prior to the tournament, Widjaja scouted the Israeli's style of play by speaking with her friends on the women's circuit.

"All my friends told me she's better on the backhand and she plays like this and that. And it's true, her backhand is much better and I think she's a very good clay court player," said Widjaja.

The defeat was disappointing for Smashnova, who has had a very good season, breaking into the million-dollar club in winnings this year after a victory in Vienna.

A few weeks before Wimbledon, Smashnova beat defending champion Iroda Tulyaganova in straight sets to win the $170,000 (US) Wien (Vienna) Energie Grand Prix tournament.

Smashnova dominated her opponent from Uzbekistan, defeating Tulyaganova 6-4, 6-1. She rose to number 17 in the world rankings as a result of her victory.

The placing was an all-time high for an Israeli tennis player, either male or female, and is one better than Amos Mansdorf, who reached 18 in the men's ATP rankings for one week in 1987.

Mansdorf subsequently ended that year in 23rd position, his best year on the ATP Tour.

Smashnova, who started the year in 87th position, has won three ranking events in 2000. Her previous tournament victories were at the very start of the year in Auckland, New Zealand, and Canberra, Australia. Only the Williams sisters, Venus and Serena, have each won more events this year.

Leafs team doctor had an eventful year

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

At 47, Dr. Michael Clarfield isn't exactly a kid in hockey camp, but his job makes him feel that way.

In addition to running a mid-town sports injury clinic, The Sports Medicine Specialists, he's one of three doctors who tend to the star athletes of the Toronto Maple Leafs.

Not only does he get to watch his beloved Leafs at almost every home game and travel with the team during the playoffs, he's had a bird's-eye view of all the action, shmoozing with the players and sharing the ups and downs of successful and not so successful seasons.

"It's been unbelievable. It's been a great career. I've seen a lot of things with the Leafs, met great people," he said.

Clarfield smiles at just about every Leafs memory. It's clear he loves his work with the team, even though it's a job that keeps him busy at the best of times. This year has been one for the books.

Beyond the sprains and strains of professional athletes enduring an 82-game season, Clarfield and the other team doctors had some extraordinary maladies to contend with: two coaches experienced serious illnesses – Keith Acton was diagnosed with cancer, Pat Quinn suffered heart problems – while Dmitri Yushkevich, a key defenceman, was taken out of the lineup with a dangerous blood clot and Art Jackson, the nephew of former Maple Leaf great Busher Jackson, collapsed during a pre-game ceremony and died despite Clarfield's best efforts to resuscitate him.

And all that came in addition to this year's playoff drama and post-season injury bug, which hit the Leafs much harder than management let on.

Still, it was a memorable season, one that Clarfield ranks up there with the Gilmour years in the early 1990s, when the Leafs twice advanced to the final four before being eliminated.

With the season over, Clarfield was at liberty to discuss some of the injuries that Leaf officialdom tried to downplay during the playoff run.

Mats Sundin's broken wrist was well documented, but defenceman Jyrki Lumme was in much worse shape than many had imagined. He did not suffer a concussion, as was rumoured, but instead "had a really bad shoulder" that included a torn bicep tendon and a separated shoulder.

Forward Darcy Tucker's injury was reported simply as an upper body injury when in fact he had a dislocated shoulder and fractured scapula (shoulder/back bone). And enforcer Tie Domi had a high ankle sprain, which is more serious than a regular sprain.

"There were so many injuries this year that I'd never seen before," Clarfield said.

In early March, Clarfield and thousands of spectators attending a Buffalo-Toronto game were shaken by an unforeseen turn of events.

During pre-game ceremonies to honour the Leafs' greatest players, Art Jackson collapsed on the bench just as he was about to stride onto the ice. As the pre-game ceremonies continued in the darkened arena, Clarfield worked frantically for 10 minutes trying to revive him. When the lights went on, spectators could see a stretcher being used to carry the stricken Jackson from the arena.

"It was a very surreal experience. We're trying to perform live resuscitation and the ceremonies go on," he said.

One of Clarfield's favourite memories dates back to those heady days in 1993 when the Leafs tangled with the Kings in the semi-finals and the Doug Gilmour-led team looked poised to advance to the Stanley Cup finals.

As Leafs fans know all too well, Gilmour was clipped by a Gretzky high stick, but a penalty was not called. Inside the Leafs dressing room, Clarfield was busy: "We're trying to sew Gilmour up and [then coach Pat] Burns comes into the dressing room and rips a sink off the wall and throws it across the room," he said, smiling at the memory.

There were some "dark years" mixed in with the good ones, but Clarfield is grateful for the turn of events that led him into the Leafs' inner sanctum.

When he completed his medical residency in 1982, sports medicine was in its embryonic stages. Clarfield had always loved sports and he saw the opportunity to combine his love of medicine with his interest in athletics.

Mentored by Dr. Charles Bull, the doctor for Team Canada in 1972, Clarfield gravitated to sports medicine. "At that time I was a wandering gypsy, working in a lot of clinics."

As public interest in physical fitness grew, so did Clarfield's sports injury practice. Eventually he would become director of the clinic at Yonge Street and Davisville Avenue, which recently moved to Eglinton Avenue. The clinic, he said, offers weekend athletes the same level of care it provides to the pros. With doctors, physiotherapists and other professionals on staff, it treats all manner of ailments related to just about every kind of sport.

"You have to be a jack of all sports and understand the mechanics of sports," he said. "Without that, you can't treat the injury or it will come back."

Like many NHL pros, Clarfield paid his dues in the minor leagues before getting called up to "the show."

In the mid-1980s he worked with the OHL's Toronto Marlies. In 1988, he received a call from then Maple Leafs GM Floyd Smith asking if he would be interested in replacing the team's retiring doctor. After pondering the offer for about a nanosecond, Clarfield said yes.

He's still smiling at that memory.

When he's not treating his patients or other Leafs, Clarfield coaches a tykes team in the Avenue Road Hockey League. He has also served as medical director of the Canadian team at the Maccabiah Games in 1989 and 1993, bringing Leafs athletic therapists Chris Broadhurst and Brett Smith with him to Israel.

NHL teams draft pair of Jewish skaters

By ADAM GRACHNIK
CJN Intern

NHL players should beware. Two young Jewish skaters will soon be challenging them for their jobs and the privilege to play hockey at the highest level.

At the June 22 NHL entry draft in Toronto's Air Canada Centre, Adam Henrich,18, was selected 60th overall (second round) by the Tampa Bay Lightning, and Robert Gherson went in the fifth round (145th overall) to the Washington Capitals.

"I've been looking forward to this my whole life," said Henrich, a 6-foot-4, 215-pound winger with the Ontario Hockey League's (OHL) Brampton Battalion. "When I got called, it was the best feeling in my life. It was a good day. I couldn't stop smiling."

"It [getting drafted] has always been a dream. Anyone who puts on skates has dreamt of it," added Gherson, a 6-foot, 152-pound netminder with the OHL's Sarnia Sting. "It is also a big relief to finally hear my name."

Henrich said the entire process made him very nervous.

"I didn't sleep the night before," said the power forward, who compares himself to Philadelphia Flyer John Leclair. "I was so nervous the whole day I didn't want to talk to anyone."

The Lightning originally had the fourth overall pick in the draft, but traded it to Philadelphia for left-winger Ruslan Fedotenko and two second-round selections. After another trade with the Dallas Stars, the Lightning's first draft choice became Henrich.

"He [Henrich] fits our profile. Our team is talking about improving our size and speed," said Lightning general manager Jay Feaster. "He obviously has good hands. In the second half of the season, he added a power forward aspect to his game. He will continue to develop and is the complete package."

Henrich is fresh off a solid sophomore season in Brampton, where he scored 33 goals for a total of 63 points, good enough to lead his team in scoring. In April, he represented Canada at the World Under 18 Championships in Slovakia, using his physical presence to rack up 43 penalty minutes.

"He is going to continue to work at being a power forward," said Feaster. "It is now up to to him to continue to develop. Just because he got drafted doesn't mean he will make it."

NHL Central Scouting, the body that rates amateur hockey players, had predicted both players would be selected higher in the draft.

"It's an honour to be drafted. It doesn't matter when you are drafted, but what you do after the draft that counts," said Gherson, who was slated to go 70th overall.

Henrich was touted as a late first-round pick, ranked 23rd among North American skaters.

"[I] wasn't happy [that I dropped]. I wanted to go higher. But I've seen a lot of second- and third-rounders make it over first-rounders in the past," Henrich said.

The Henrich family has been through the draft day experience before. Adam's older brother, Michael, was picked 13th overall by the Edmonton Oilers in 1998 and he continues to develop and improve his professional game with Hamilton in the American Hockey League.

"[I've] watched him for many years. He has helped me out and talked to me," said Adam. "I have really just watched and learned from him."

Gherson said he's learned a lot studying his idol, Patrick Roy.

"[I] love Patrick Roy and watch him the most. I watch how he plays [and see] how solid he is technically and how he battles. I really try to match that," said Gherson, who posted an .879 save percentage in 55 games this year with the Sting.

Gherson is a teammate of Eric Himelfarb, the speedy Jewish scorer selected 171st by the Montreal Canadians last season, The duo account for 50 per cent of the known Jewish players in the league.

"[I] always play Jewish geography with other guys. During Passover, we were playing Erie [Otters]. Cory Pecker and I were talking about matzah on the ice," he said. Pecker was drafted 166th overall by the Calgary Flames in 1999.

During the summer, Gherson and Henrich will spend a lot of time in the gym bulking up. Henrich says he also wants to work on his skating and his quickness, while Gherson intends to improve his puckhandling skills.

At training camp, Gherson might have to face the likes of Peter Bondra and Jaromir Jagr, which he says "is amazing. Not a lot of people can say they stopped Jagr."

Henrich is confident and says "[he] plans on making the team.

יעל זליגר

פתאום מראה המלחמה: לאומיות ואלימות בשירה העברית בשנות ה- 40 מאת: חנן חבר (הקיבוץ המאוחד)

בשנת 1934 פרסם אברהם שלונסקי את ספר השירים 'אבני בוהו' (הוצאת יחדיו). הספר שימש כמורה דרך לאסכולה השירית של אותן השנים. נתן אלתרמן, יוכבד בת-מרים, יעקב אורלנד, עזרא זוסמן, אליהו טסלר, לאה גולדברג, אלכסנדר פן, יונתן רטוש ואחרים אימצו את הציור הלשוני, מבנה ותמטיקה סימבוליסטית של שלונסקי. האוטוריטה של אסכולת שלונסקי נשתרשה בשירה העברית. כך היה עד לספטמבר 1939.

עם פלישת הגרמנים לפולין חל מהפך בתודעה הספרותית בארץ. "במרכזו של שיח השירה עמדה אז שאלת יצוג האלימות, זו של הרודפים וזו של הנרדפים" מסכם חנן חבר בהקדמה לספרו: 'פתאום מראה המלחמה: לאומיות ואלימות בשירה העברית בשנות ה- 40'.

חנן חבר, פרופסור לספרות עברית תמיד מעדיף לדבר על ספרות ישראלית ולא ספרות עברית. בספרו המרתיב האחרון, בו הוא מסכם את גלי התפתחות הספרות העברית הוא מאפיין ספרות זו "כספרות שנכתבת כאן". וכך גם הספרות שנכתבה בשנות ה- 40 בארץ. יותר מכל ספרות זו חבויה לידי ביטוי פחד קולקטיבי.

בשלב הראשון, תשיח הספרותי של שנות ה-40 התפתח כתגובה לאירועי פרוץ מלחמת העולם השניה. מדובר על תגובה גם כאשר מדובר בנסיונות לכתוב במכוון על הכל רק לא על המלחמה. בהקשר זה ידועה במיוחד מחאתה של לאה גולדברג: "לא רק היתר הוא למשורר לכתוב בימי מלחמה שיר-אהבה, אלא הכרח, משום שגם בימי מלחמה רב ערכה של האהבה מערך הרצח." (1939).

דבריה של גולדברג עוררו סערה. היו שהצדיקו את דבקות המשוררת ב"נצחיותה של הלוריקה" והיו שגינו את המשוררת על התנערותה כביכול מאסון המלחמה. גולדברג עמדה בשלה: "לא זכות בלבד היא למשורר בימות הזוועה לשיר שירו לטבע, לאילנות הפורחים, לילדים היודעים לצחוק, אלא חובה, החובה להזכיר לאדם כי עדיין אדם הוא, כי קיימים בעולם אותם הערכים הפשוטים והנצחיים העושים את החיים ליקרים יותר, את המוות למושלם יותר, את המוות ולא את הרצח." (1939).

בשלב השני כבר חילחלה בתודעה שהחרג בשדות האימה של אירופה אינו מסוג הרדיפות שידע העם היהודי אלא משהו חדש: רצח שיטתי של העם כולו. בשלב זה חל מהפך ביצירה הספרותית בארץ ושירתו של אלתרמן עולה ועולה כמייצגת תקופה חשובה זו. בשנת 1944 אלתרמן מפרסם את 'שירי מכות מצרים':

"קְבוּרִי, בכורי הַבָּוו, לָדָם הים המים,
כִּי דם טהור בכורי, כי דם שֶׁפֶךְ כמים.
חשכו עמקי הבאר, אדמו עיני הַבְּעִיר,
כי דם היה בעיר ולא חרדה העיר."

אלה ימים של שנאה, של חוקיות באלימות הפוגעת בכל; חוקיות שחורטת כל סדר עולם.

"אבי, התוהו באי! מה תחכה בכדיני?"

עם כל הכאב שבמאבק לעצמאות, לקוֹלוֹת הספרותיים היו מאפיינים שהצביעו על שינוי מובחק בדימויי הלאומי. לא עוד היינו לנרדפים. למדנו גם להיות רודפים. לא אחת, שנות מלחמת הקוממיות מוזכרות כתוֹוייה; "אלה היו שנות חיינו היפות ביותר! והחטיבה בסדר... החטיבה הייתה מאה אחוז" אומרים החברים אחד לשני בסיפור 'הפגישה בעיקול הדרך' שכתב בזמנו חיים גורי.

אני שואלת: כיצד נגדיר מחר את מאפייני השירה הנכתבת היום בארץ, פתאום למראה המלחמה? ימים יגידו.

Dear Norene

Tired of the same old salads? Perhaps it's time to explore greener pastures!

This bean-based salad from Vegetables Every Day by Jack Bishop (HarperCollins, $44.95) captures some of summer's best flavours. Serve with plenty of bread to sop up the juices. For the sweetest green beans, Bishop suggests buying them at the height of summer, selecting crisp, slim beans.

GREEN BEAN SALAD WITH TOMATOES & FETA CHEESE

1 lb. green beans (preferably a mix of green and yellow beans), ends snapped off salt
2 medium ripe tomatoes (about 1 pound), cored, cut into 1/2-inch cubes
1 small shallot, minced
2 tbsp. extra-virgin olive oil
1 tbsp. lemon juice
2 tbsp. minced fresh parsley leaves freshly ground black pepper
2 oz. feta cheese, crumbled (about 1/2 cup)

Bring several quarts of water to a boil in a large saucepan. Add the beans and salt to taste. Cook until crisp-tender, about 5 minutes. Drain, shake dry, then spread out over a clean towel so they dry quickly. Cool to room temperature.

Combine tomatoes, shallot, oil, lemon juice, parsley and pepper in a large serving bowl. Add beans and adjust seasonings, using salt sparingly. Sprinkle feta cheese over salad. Serve immediately. Serves 4 to 6 as a first course.

Sharon Sanders, author of Cooking Up an Italian Life (Pergola West, $26.95 U.S.), believes you don't have to live in Italy to eat like an Italian. This refreshing salad, also known as Panzanella, cuts through the heat of a sweltering day. A smattering of chopped fresh chili pepper makes a spunky addition. Day-old bread works perfectly; just add a bit more cold water to reconstitute.

BREAD SALAD WITH TOMATO, CUCUMBER, ONION & BASIL

8 oz. rustic bread (1/3 to 3/4 of a loaf), cut into 1/2-inch-wide slices
1/3 to 1/4 cup olive oil
2 tbsp. red or white wine vinegar
3/4 tsp. salt
2 medium-large fresh tomatoes, coarsely chopped
1/2 English cucumber, peeled, coarsely chopped
1 small red onion, coarsely chopped and rinsed
1/4 cup loosely packed slivered fresh basil leaves ground black pepper

Toast bread in a toaster, toaster oven or broiler. Cut into 1/2-inch cubes; set aside to cool.

In a large bowl, whisk 1/3 cup oil, vinegar and salt. Add tomatoes, cucumber, onion, basil and bread. Toss and set aside for 15 to 30 minutes at room temperature. Press salad occasionally with the back of a spoon so tomatoes release their juice. Taste a bread cube. If too dry, drizzle with up to 1/4 cup more oil or a few tablespoons of cold water. Season generously with pepper. Serves 4 to 6.

STILL AN IMMIGRANT HAVEN: Even in the midst of ongoing violence against the Jewish state, new immigrants continue to arrive. Here, a Jewish Agency representative greets a group from the former Soviet Union (FSU) last month at Ben-Gurion Airport. As of the end of May, 12,344 new immigrants have arrived in Israel this year, including 6,980 from the FSU and 2,102 from Argentina. [Israel Sun photo]

'Every death devastates'

The story of an unsung hero

By YAFFA NEVO
Special to The CJN

Saul Bornstein of Bat Yam tries to find the balance between life and death. Suicide bombers have kept him very busy during the last 1½ years. The owner of a fish store also volunteers with Magen David Adom and ZKA, the Victims Identification Unit. When his beepers go off, he drops everything and rushes to the scene. First he attends to the wounded. Then he painstakingly collects the body fragments of the dead and injured.

His two beepers make different sounds to avoid confusion. The general call goes out to all volunteers, and they all show up. Saul's little car is his ambulance, carrying both lifesaving equipment and the tools of ZKA: nylon bags, tweezers, towels and special paper for the absorption of blood.

When injured people are present, he wears the familiar identifying jacket of MDA and helps save their lives. Once all those injured have been evacuated, he puts on the distinctive yellow jacket of ZKA and shifts to the mitzvah of attending the dead, known as chesed shel emet.

Israel innovates gene therapy

By JESSICA STEINBERG
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Dr. Shimon Slavin, a slim man with stick-straight white hair, holds two of his patients in his arms.

Tassnem Abu Said, 6, daintily kisses the doctor's left cheek, while her sister, Salsabil, 22 months, offers a slightly moister version on his right side.

"Shukran," Slavin says in Arabic, thanking the two curly, dark-haired Israeli Arab sisters who scamper back to their father, Tahir, and mother, Hayam, sitting nearby.

Salsabil toddles out of sight, her small red shoes moving to the shiny metal elevator doors. Tahir quickly darts over to scoop her up before her chubby fingers get caught in the elevator doors.

It isn't unusual for toddlers to embark on search and explore missions. But 1½ years ago, Salsabil was living in a Hadassah hospital isolation unit, under the care of Slavin, who heads the bone marrow transplantation department at the Hadassah-Hebrew University Medical Center.

She and Tassnem were both "bubble babies," born without immune systems, a genetic disease known as severe combined immunodeficiency. SCID is caused by the lack of an essential enzyme, adenosine dramina-se, or ADA, that creates a functioning immune system. Bubble babies are so named because the first patients diagnosed with SCID were isolated for prolonged periods in germ-free plastic tents.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Financial Difficulties

CALGARY — The Calgary Jewish Community Council has agreed to provide one-time emergency assistance to the cash-strapped Akiva Academy. The financial aid, which will not exceed $100,000, is conditional on the school developing a repayment plan.

Proposed Changes

OTTAWA — More than 70 per cent of the members of the Beth Shalom Synagogue have voted for the shul's board of governors to move the shul out of the Orthodox movement and join the Union of Traditional Judaism. Under the proposed changes, there would be mixed seating in the chapel and women would be allowed to read the Haftorah and open the Ark. The move is seen as an effort to attract more young families as the downtown shul faces a declining and aging membership.

ISRAEL

Palestinians Protest

GAZA — About 4,000 Palestinians marched on Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's Gaza headquarters last week to protest corruption and a lack of food, jobs and unemployment benefits.

Farrakhan Barred

JERUSALEM — Israel has decided to bar controversial Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan, who is currently touring the Mideast. He had planned to propose that he mediate in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, Ha'aretz reported.

Expulsions Nixed

JERUSALEM — Israel can't exile Palestinian suicide bombers' families to other countries, Israel's attorney general Elyakim Rubinstein said last week, since such a move could result in war crimes charges against Israel. But he did not rule out moving the families from the West Bank to the Gaza Strip.

WORLD

Egyptian Nukes?

CAIRO — Egypt has announced plans to build a nuclear plant for generating electricity. Egypt's electricity and energy minister, Hassan Ahmed Yunes, announced that the country's first such facility would be built on the coast northwest of Alexandria, Ha'aretz reported. The statement came several days after a German newspaper reported Egypt is trying to develop nuclear weapons.

SS Guard Deported

WASHINGTON — An ex-SS concentration camp guard became the 56th Nazi war criminal removed from the United States when he departed voluntarily for Austria last week ahead of a forced government removal. In August 2000, an immigration judge found Michael Gruber, 86, had served as an armed SS guard at the Sachsenhausen concentration camp in Oranienburg, Germany in 1943 and 1944. A retired auto mechanic who was born in Croatia but who is a citizen of Austria, Gruber left when an immigration tribunal ruled it didn't have jurisdiction to consider his appeal.

Poles Honoured

KRAKOW — Israel honoured six non-Jewish Poles last week for protecting Poland's Jewish heritage. Israeli Ambassador Shevach Weiss presented the Preserving Memory awards at a ceremony that closed the annual Festival of Jewish Culture here. Honorees included the mayor of a town that placed a monument on the site of a shul destroyed during World War II and a priest who headed the cleanup of his town's Jewish cemetery.

Apartheid Foe Dies

LONDON — Lionel "Rusty" Bernstein, a leader of the anti-apartheid struggle in South Africa, died in Oxford, England, on June 23 at 82. A leading member of South Africa's Communist Party, Bernstein was responsible for much of the written material issued by the nation's liberation movement in exile before the 1990s. He was also a co-defendant with Nelson Mandela in two major political trials. In the second, Mandela was sentenced to life in jail but Bernstein was acquitted because of insufficient evidence linking him to "revolutionary" activities. Bernstein then fled to Britain with his family, where he lived until his death.

Shoah Memorial

TAIPEI — Taiwan's first Holocaust memorial has been installed in a Christian church in the county of Tainan, with the assistance of Israeli diplomats in Taipei. Israel's representative to Taiwan, Menasheh Zippori, said it would help people understand what happened during the Holocaust.

Jews get Restitution

BRUSSELS — Officials here have agreed to pay about $55 million (US) to the Jewish community for property stolen or abandoned during the Nazi occupation. Under deals signed June 27, the government will pay $44.7 million, the country's insurance companies $9.8 million and the national bank $295,000. Talks between Jewish groups and private banks to reach a separate agreement are ongoing.

Anti-extremism Bill

MOSCOW — Russia's Parliament passed a bill June 27 aimed at combating extremism. If the bill is signed into law, it will outlaw the use of Nazi symbols, the promotion of any kind of ethnic or religious hatred and the bankrolling of such activity.

U.S. Evangelicals Voice Support for Israel

NEW YORK — A former U.S. presidential candidate delivered a letter of support for Israel last week from a broad range of 28 American evangelical Christians.

"We condemn the moral relativism that confuses those being murdered with those doing the murdering," read the letter brought to Israel by Gary Bauer, the president of a group called American Values who ran as a Republican candidate in the 2000 presidential primaries.

"We demand that the United Nations and other international bodies end their silence on the atrocities committed against civilian men and women, young and old in Israel."

Others who signed the letter were convicted Watergate felon Charles Colson, for Prison Fellowship, and talk show host Janet Parshall.

CMDA fighting loss of charitable status in court

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

An impending decision by the Federal Court of Appeal in a tax case being fought by Canadian Magen David Adom for Israel (CMDA) could cost the organization its charitable status for operating outside Israel's pre-1967 borders.

No matter the outcome, the case will have far-reaching consequences for all charities that raise money in Canada for Israel, said prominent Ottawa tax lawyer Arthur Drache, who is representing CMDA.

For years, organizations raising money here for Israel have been restricted to sending money solely for use inside the Green Line, Israel's pre-1967 borders.

If CMDA wins its case, that restriction will be removed. If it loses, Drache said, CMDA will have its federally registered charitable status revoked and will no longer be permitted to issue income tax receipts, and the same could happen to similar groups operating beyond the Green Line.

The Canada Customs and Revenue Agency (CCRA) notified CMDA about two years ago that it was in violation of the Income Tax Act and that its registration was being revoked.

At a hearing last month in Ottawa, the Crown's lawyer said ambulances donated by Canadians through CMDA were operating in the West Bank, Gaza and east Jerusalem, which Canada considers part of the West Bank, and he further alleged that they were not always being used for medical purposes.

Drache argued there is no legal weight to the "public policy" the CCRA has cited for the past decade as the reason it does not recognize charities that send money into the occupied territories.

Drache maintained that tax officials "invented" the unwritten policy in 1991. He said it stems from a presumption that, because Israel's occupation of the West Bank and Gaza is disputed by the Canadian government, ordinary Canadians would not accept that donations to Israeli activities in those territories be tax-deductible in Canada.

"'Public policy' is infinitely harder to establish than government policy; [public policy] is not a matter of law," Drache said in an interview with The CJN.

CMDA's auditor Donald Hersh, who attended the proceedings, said that one of the three judges who heard the case asked, " 'Where is this public policy written?' There was no response from the Crown attorney. It couldn't be established where this policy can be found."

As to accusations that Magen David Adom ambulances were being used for non-medical purposes, Hersh said "the Crown couldn't back that up with any evidence."

Drache said he doesn't know when a judgment will come down, but he anticipates it will not be before September. He said that until a decision is made otherwise, CMDA continues to operate legally and can issue valid tax receipts.

The other major issue in this case, Drache said, is a technical one that involves ownership of the ambulances CMDA sends to Israel. The CCRA contends that under the Income Tax Act, CMDA should have retained title over the vehicles, either directly or through an agreed upon agent, he said.

Winds of change?

From the editor's desk

It was only a coincidence, but the timing of the two developments ought not to be ignored, for they may augur at least a bracing breeze, if not yet the winds of change in the Arab world.

Barely one week after U.S. President George W. Bush staked out a definitive claim for radical change of the Palestinian leadership, an all-Arab blue-ribbon panel of renowned intellectuals staked out a definitive claim for radical change of Arab societies.

Published under the auspices of the United Nations, the report entitled the Arab Human Development Report 2002, was refreshingly honest in its observations of Arab world society, and surprisingly blunt in its recommendations.

The report warns the Arab world and the leaders of the 22 different states that comprise its wide geographic compass, that Arab society is terribly stagnating and runs the risk of being left far behind the rest of the globe in all measurable categories of advancement and progress. There are essentially three ubiquitously applicable reasons for this stagnation, the authors of the report point out: the utter lack of political freedoms, the repression of women and the woefully sub-standard, inward-looking norms of public education.

The report was assembled by an advisory team of high-profile Arab thinkers who culled their conclusions from the presentations of nearly 30 different Arab scholars and authorities on a range of relevant subjects including Arab demographics, sociology, economics and culture.

"The Arab world is at a crossroads. The fundamental choice is whether its trajectory will remain marked by inertia… and by ineffective policies that have produced the substantial development challenges facing the region; or whether prospects for an Arab renaissance, anchored in human development, will be actively pursued."

These are uncompromising words. They form part of the concluding remarks of the report.

The authors lament that the "wave of democracy… has barely reached the Arab states," and the result of this diminished reach, they candidly aver, "undermines human development."

Some of the absolute and comparative statistics are quite revealing, indeed quite eye-popping.

The entire Arab world of 22 nation states comprising some 280 million people

• generates a GDP smaller than that of Spain;

• translates about 330 books annually, approximately one fifth the number that Greece alone translates; and

• invests less than one seventh of the world average in scientific research.

The report goes on to say that nearly one quarter of the adult Arab world is illiterate. Some 65 million Arab adults, including half of all the women, cannot read. More than 10 million children do not even go to school.

Again, in a departure from the usual platitudes, the report says of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict that it has been both an impediment to the progress of the Palestinian people and an excuse for continuing that lack of progress.

One of the ironies in the timing of the report's release is its resounding resonance with the theme and the language of Bush's call for greater democratization of the Palestinian polity.

"The Israeli-Palestinian conflict has been both a cause and a pretext for delaying democratic change," Rima Khalaf Hunaidi, director of the UN Development Program's Arab regional bureau, said in Cairo upon releasing the report. "We say that the Palestinians should be able to determine their own future. But we also say that the rest of the Arab countries have to start promoting democracy and equality for all."

Despite its historic forthrightness, the report does not directly point an accusing finger at or specifically mention Islamic militants or the despots and strongmen who run the closed, police states. To expect otherwise would be to expect too much from this ground-breaking study.

[Illustration by M. Nisimov]

Bashir Assad

Neither Bashir Assad nor Saddam Hussein will likely take the report home with him for a quiet evening read. The consciences of the Royal Saudi rulers will not any time soon yield new progressive, egalitarian policies toward the women in their kingdom. Nor will the tired, corrupt ruler of the Palestine Authority be convinced by the report's ringing cri de coeur that perhaps Bush has struck a quivering Palestinian nerve.

None of these men, or their like, will be moved by the report. But they will likely keep a closer watch on currents of change that may be slowly undulating their way across the approaching sands.

New immigration laws create concern at JIAS

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Although some of the recent changes to Canada's immigration and refugee laws are "quite positive," others are causing concern at JIAS Toronto, says Mila Voihanski, the agency's acting executive director.

One sticking point – or potential sticking point – under the new Immigration and Refugee Protection Act (details of which are available at www.cic.gc.ca) involves changes to the point system used to assess independent immigrants.

Also, under a new agreement with the United States, emigrants who arrive via the United States are no longer allowed to enter Canada as refugees because the United States is considered a safe country, Voihanski said last week.

Although JIAS does not deal with many refugee claimants, all of the recent ones – about half a dozen families in the past six months – have entered Canada via the United States after leaving South America and the former Soviet Union, she said.

For individual immigrants, the Canadian government has raised the minimum number of points necessary to immigrate from 70 to 75 out of 100, said Voihanski. At one point, she noted, it looked like the number was going to go up to 80.

"The education requirements are much higher now," she said. "You need at least 17 years of study or its equivalent. That will make it problematic for a lot of people coming from a lot of different countries." Points are also awarded for work experience and adaptability, which includes family relationships in Canada, and for a spouse's education.

Unless potential immigrants have prearranged employment or close relatives in Canada, netting them an additional five points respectively, it will be more difficult for them to qualify, explained Voihanski.

Another thing that is troublesome, she added, is that "some knowledge" of English or French is "not good enough any more."

Under the old regulations, Voihanski clarified, 9 was the top mark possible for ability in one of Canada's official languages. Proficiency in both means up to 24 points, but the highest rating possible for the first language is 16. "Moderate proficiency [in English or French] gives you 8 points. There's not that much difference between 9 and 6 [for moderate proficiency under the old system], but [under the new system] if you get 8, you don't make it.

"We are worried that it will impact our clients immensely," said Voihanski. "We have a lot of potential immigrants. Everybody is worried."

On the other hand, she noted, it would be premature to make judgments, because the new regulations only came into effect on June 28, and she has yet to see them in action. As of last week, JIAS staff members were still receiving training regarding the new laws.

Voihanski said it is hard to predict accurately how clients will be affected because the act leaves things like what constitutes the equivalent of 17 years of full-time study to the discretion of the pre-immigration interviewing officer.

On the positive side, Voihanski noted, parents can now sponsor children up to age 21, an additional two years beyond what the previous regulations allowed; common law spouses are now included under the definition of family; the upper age limit of immigrants receiving 10 points has been raised to 49 from 44; and same-sex partners are recognized.

"I guess they're moving with the times," Voihanski said.

Tisha b'Av program planned

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

For the 14th year, Rabbi Jay Kelman, spiritual leader of Beth Jacob v'Anshei Drildz Congregation, will be organizing a community-wide program to mark Tisha b'Av.

Tisha b'Av, which this year is from the evening of July 17 to sunset July 18, marks the destruction of both Temples in Jerusalem, as well as a series of disasters that befell the Jews on that day. It is a day of fasting and mourning.

The program, to be held at the synagogue on July 18, will consist of the regular prayers and lamentations for the day, a film from the Chofetz Chaim Heritage Foundation and five speakers.

Rabbi Kelman said he tries to bring in a wide range of speakers. This year, participants include Rabbi Yossi Michalowitz of Aish Hatorah; Rabbi Eliyahu Attias, head of Kollel Yismach Moshe, the new Sephardi kollel of Toronto; and Elliott Malamet, a teacher at CHAT and a columnist for The Canadian Jewish News. Rabbi Kelman will discuss 10 or 12 of the lamentations.

The rabbi, who said he considers these programs as one of the things for which he is best known and one of the things he is most proud of, said he sees the Tisha b'Av programs as "a way to bring meaning into the day," which he sees as not just a time to mourn, but "as a time of reflection and reawakening."

Lawyer seeks to end visa-free entry for Saudis

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

A Toronto immigration lawyer has warned the federal government about a potentially serious threat to Canada's national security.

Sergio Karas recently drew attention to the fact that a citizen of Saudi Arabia who wants to travel to Canada is not required to apply for a temporary resident visa under section 190 of the new Immigration and Refugee Protection Act, which was enacted last year and took effect June 28.

Karas made this concern known to Denis Coderre, the minister of citizenship and immigration, and Johanne Deslauriers, the department of citizenship and immigration's director of social policy, which drafted section 190 (formerly known as section 183).

In a Jan. 17 letter to Deslauriers, copies of which were sent to Coderre and Foreign Affairs Minister Bill Graham, Karas noted that most of the Arab hijackers who crashed commercial airliners into the World Trade Center and the Pentagon last September were Saudi nationals.

"In light of the events of Sept. 11... it seems difficult to understand why Saudi Arabia remains on the list of countries whose citizens are allowed to enter Canada without first obtaining a visa," Karas wrote.

On May 16, Karas wrote Coderre about the matter.

Neither Coderre nor Deslauriers have replied, nor did Coderre's office return several calls and two e-mail messages from The CJN.

Graham's department acknowledged Karas' letter on Feb. 11 and forwarded it to Coderre.

Karas also sent a letter to Paul Cellucci, the U.S. ambassador to Canada.

On Feb. 7, Leslie Ann Gerson, the minister counsellor in the American embassy, answered: "I can assure you that discussions between our two countries on the visa process, including the use of the visa waiver, are ongoing and that your letter addresses a very real concern."

Karas said Canadian visa officers and intelligence personnel should be given the opportunity to examine the background of Saudis before they enter Canada.

In an interview, Karas described Canada's policy as dangerous, saying it endangers Jewish Canadians.

"The Jewish community should be extremely concerned about this policy. It is amazing that Saudis should be treated on the same level as the United States, Britain and Europeans. After 9/11, it makes no sense whatsoever."

Karas said Saudi Arabia does not accord visa-free entry to Canadians, and it also restricts travel by foreigners inside Saudi Arabia and requires disclosure of religion in visa applications.

He said that Saudis, like Egyptians and Jordanians, should be required to obtain a visa before they travel to Canada.

"According to most respected intelligence sources, it is beyond dispute that the government of Saudi Arabia and Saudi nationals appear to be financing or supporting terrorist activities around the world," Karas said in his letter to Deslauriers.

Canada, he added, is one of the few remaining Western nations still according Saudis the right of visa-free entry.

"I fail to see why Canada should continue to reward the citizens of a country which actively supports and funds terrorism, needlessly exposing Canadians to unnecessary risks and international criticism for granting such ill-advised exemption to Saudi nationals."

Karas recommended that Ottawa should immediately relieve Saudi Arabia of its visa-exempt status.

As well, he urged Canadians to call their members of Parliament and complain about Canada's policy.

Among foreign nationals who do not need temporary resident visas under section 190 are citizens of Israel, the United States, Britain, Germany, France, Malaysia, Portugal, Switzerland, Brunei, Italy, Spain, Sweden, Greece, Ireland, Costa Rica, Japan, Mexico, St. Vincent, Barbados and Bahamas.

A little girl with a big heart for Israel

By ADAM GRACHNIK
CJN Intern

Instead of receiving dolls, toys, candy or clothes for her birthday this year, a seven-year-old Toronto girl decided to ask her family to donate money to Israel.

Batya Isaacson, 7, told her family not to buy her birthday gifts because "all the poor people in Israel need the money."

The philanthropic effort has already raised $550 for the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, which Batya says makes her "feel good because the Jewish people in Israel get medical help."

Her mother, Monique Isaacson, was pleased with her daughter's initiative.

"I think it's great that she thought to do this," said Isaacson. "If it can go to help a good cause, why not?"

The federation is also impressed with Batya's contribution.

"Where else would you see a seven-year-old child, who is big enough to say [she doesn't want] gifts, because Israel needs it more?" said Dan Horowitz, UJA Federation's senior communications coordinator. "It sets a great precedent [and is] nice to see."

Batya Isaacson

According to Isaacson, her daughter got the idea on her own, though her two older siblings influenced Batya with their own frequent donations to tzedakah.

Isaacson said for years, her son Joshua, 8, and daughter Talia, 11, have given money to Mazon Canada, a charity that raises money from within the Jewish community to help fight hunger across the country, and also to the Toronto Breakfast Club.

"It started when my older daughter [started] collecting the money," she said. "[It's the] kind of family we're from. We believe in tzedakah and I instill it in my kids."

"Giving is important thing. You have to learn by example," said Isaacson. "I have really great kids."

Israeli organization helps Jewish and Arab kids

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Even the average Israeli probably hasn't heard of Orr Shalom Children's Homes.

The non-profit organization, which operates a network in Israel of "family group homes" run by couples for about 270 children who have suffered abuse or neglect, "is about melting into the community," says Alisa Olmert, Orr Shalom's chair.

But on a recent overseas visit, Olmert (who is married to Jerusalem mayor Ehud Olmert) and Haim Feingold, Orr Shalom's executive director, spent several days raising awareness among supporters and potential supporters about the homes, which can each accommodate up to 10 children.

The organization receives 85 per cent of its funding from local welfare authorities. The rest comes from private donors and federations, including UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Although Orr Shalom's funding has not been cut recently, as is the case with many Israeli social service agencies, it has incurred unforeseen expenses due to the current intifadah. One example is finding a replacement for group home fathers who have been called up for reserve army duty. Increasing security for the homes is another.

One of the organization's most recent projects, which opened this spring after taking three years to get off the ground, is a Bedouin home in partnership with a Bedouin non-profit organization.

Although there were many difficulties in setting up the project – differences in mentality, culture and language – the current intifadah was not an issue as far as Feingold was concerned. At seminars with the new house parents and Bedouin directors, "we had a great time together," talking and sharing experiences, Feingold said during a joint interview with Olmert at UJA Federation's offices.

A proposed Orr Shalom home in Bethlehem, within the Palestinian Authority, has been put on hold, but another home has been operating for two years in an Israeli Arab community.

"There was a barrier of mistrust and a cultural gap that had to be overcome," said Olmert.

"It takes time," Feingold said. "But we do it. They [Arabs] do it. They have to take a bigger step than we do [to accept our assistance]."

The Orthodox community is also averse to accepting help from a secular organization, Olmert said. "It has its own social system."

The fact that Orr Shalom, a secular organization, counts an Orthodox home among its 21 homes and three "little institutions" for children who need more intensive care is unusual, as is the way it came about.

Bedouin home opened

"This guy comes to me... he wants to do something good for Orr Shalom," said Feingold, who likes to share a good story. "I said, 'Okay, purchase a home. We need a home.' "

After consulting with his family, including a daughter who was a ba'alat tshuvah, the man returned to Feingold with a dilemma. His daughter wanted the home to be an observant one. "He doesn't like [the idea], but he likes his daughter," said Feingold.

Feingold consulted with authorities from the municipality of Jerusalem, which refers children in need to Orr Shalom, who confirmed that such a home was needed.

The home is run by a modern Orthodox couple and serves children from "various degrees of observant families," Feingold said.

All the Orr Shalom homes are within Israel's pre-1967 borders. "But," said Feingold, "if someone comes to me and says, 'Haim, open a home in Netzarim,' I'll go there. I go for kids, not for politics. Wherever kids need it, we'll do it."

Bad ruling, bad policy

The Federal Court of Appeal has been asked to set aside a decision by the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency (CCRA) that revokes the charitable status for income tax purposes of Canadian Magen David Adom (CMDA). As CJN reporter Janice Arnold writes in this issue, the CCRA has ruled that CMDA violates the Income Tax Act because CMDA-donated ambulances operate outside Israel's pre-1967 borders. Such use of the ambulances was deemed by the CCRA to be "activities… which lend support to Israeli settlements beyond its pre-1967 borders," thus undermining Canadian public policy – in this case on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict – and thus leaving CMDA in violation of the Income Tax Act.

The CCRA ruling is illogical, inconsistent, discriminatory, offensive, hypocritical and just plain wrong. It should be overturned.

Illogical. The decision focuses on the locale of the activity to the total exclusion of its intrinsic nature. Can there be any doubt but that the very essence of the activity by the CMDA ambulances is humanitarian and thus, patently charitable according to Canadian law? To disregard the essential activity of the charity is illogical.

Inconsistent. Certain activities that are disqualified under the Income Tax Act, by virtue of the locale of the activity, are considered fully appropriate for advancing Canadian public policy, in the very same locale, for other tax and commercial purposes, such as under the Canada-Israel Free Trade Agreement.

Offensive. By utterly ignoring the intrinsic nature of the activity for the sake of the locale of the activity, the ruling effectively says the activity will be charitable under the Income Tax Act anywhere on earth except in one spot – "beyond pre-1967 borders." The ruling therefore completely disregards and even negates any historic, religious, or emotional attachment that Canadian Jews have to the area. It singularly and offensively characterizes an otherwise valid charitable activity to be merely political in nature.

Hypocritical. Foreign Affairs Minister Bill Graham has had no difficulty in bifurcating the activities of Hamas for purposes of Canadian public policy into military ones, which violate the Income Tax Act, and humanitarian ones, which do not. It is hypocritical in the extreme to sanction humanitarian activities by a publicly-avowed terrorist organization despite its record of murdering and slaughtering Jews, yet to prohibit patently humanitarian activities by CMDA because of the locale of the activities. Why can humanitarianism be set apart even from the terrorism of one group but not from the locale of another?

Discriminatory. The CCRA ruling does not jeopardize the status of a non-Jewish Canadian charity that remits funds to a non-Jewish institution beyond the pre-1967 borders, but it does jeopardize a Jewish charity that remits funds to, in this case, maintain the operation of an ambulance in the very same location. Could there be a clearer case of discrimination against Jewish Canadians?

Wrong. It is just plain wrong, indeed unconscionable, that Canadian public policy, in essence, promotes discriminatory practices over humanitarian ones.

Israel, Jews and the left

I regret the fact that conservative elements within my community begrudge those of us who are against the occupation, who see the fact that Israel is subjecting people to unspeakable conditions. Advocating an end to the occupation is not exclaiming support for extremists. Quite the contrary, it is in Israel's best interest to end the occupation.

It is regrettably true that Palestinians have been horribly misled and many unfortunately support suicide bombings, but this does not mean that collective punishment is necessary. As we have seen, it is actually ineffective and quite counter-productive to Israel's own security needs. Furthermore, there is a Palestinian left, with whom I am in regular contact, people working quietly with international NGOs and many Israeli organizations (Gush Shalom, Peace Now, T'ayush). One should know that the likes of Palestinian-American academic Edward Said's books are banned by Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat, so these people have to work very quietly. Israelis should be reassured to know that there are very good people working to build a civil society to eventually be able to counter the horrible terrorists and form a legitimate power structure in Palestinian society.

As to the ludicrous charge (by Michael Zigman in a letter that appeared in the Montreal edition) that I owe Israel an apology, I don't think David Ben Gurion had totalitarianism in mind when he founded Israel, so I won't lend credence to the cockamamy notion that critiquing a state's activity leaves me owing an apology to said state. I believe that Ben Gurion envisioned Israel as a democracy in which criticism was welcomed. It is somewhat sad that North American armchair Zionists believe that they speak for a state. It is also somewhat Orwellian. I would expect this in regards to Iran or North Korea, not Israel. Let it be said, I love Israel, the country and the people. But I do not support its foreign policy. The Jewish community has to accept and welcome the growing majority of us who feel this way, not threaten us and attempt to discredit us.

Where were the Jews?

Gil Troy and Rabbi Reuven Bulka, two of the speakers at the recent rally Canadians Against Antisemitism in downtown Toronto, tried to impress upon us the importance of making our voices heard at this ominous time of increasing anti-Semitism in Canada and around the world. But where were the Jews to hear them?

By my estimate, Gentiles outnumbered the rally's Jewish participants 2 to 1. Frankly, I was dumbstruck at the poor showing of Jews when the issues are so important to each and every one of us.

I can't "guilt" members of our community into being more concerned, committed, verbal or informed, but I can remind you that this struggle is now "up close and personal." If you leave it to someone else to "make noise," it isn't going to happen.

Every day, letters to the editor in all the newspapers express biases against Israel and the Jews. These are written by so-called intelligent people. Even the universities are rife with anti-Semitism cloaked as anti-Israel rhetoric. So when an event such as that rally tries, as Rabbi Bulka said, "to stem the tide of evil that is enveloping us like a raging inferno," where is our support?

Truthfully, as a member of the Jewish community of Greater Toronto, I felt embarrassed and alone. Hearing my expressions of frustration, one of my fellow demonstrators said, "Now you know how isolated Israel feels."

Israel is here to stay

The State of Israel has come a long way from heroic dreams and idealistic plans to face realities unfamiliar to any other nation.

Spiritual power has enabled the Jewish people to survive over the millennia. Today, it also has physical power, which it had to develop to fight wars not of its own making. The agony of Israel's decisions lies in having to balance one with the other.

Years of tension on the borders and the continuing impasse in Israeli-Arab relations have not made Israelis bitter: they continue to hold out the hand of peace and stand ready to negotiate an agreement for security and territorial integrity with all states in the Middle East.

It is probably a unique phenomenon that a nation that has been victorious on the battlefield many times should have to sue for peace from defeated antagonists. It is to Israel's credit that peace is still first and last the nation's purpose.

Some observers unfamiliar with the tenacity and resilience of the Jewish people may doubt Israel's chance of survival – six million Israelis against 120 million Arabs – and may even be eager to see it end its existence.

Yet for thousands of years, the Jewish people – and for the last 54 years, the State of Israel – have succeeded in holding at bay the hazards and challenges that have beset their existence. No matter what, Israel is here to stay.

An open letter to the children of Israel

Greetings to a courageous people.

Recently I learned that in the Hebrew Bible, "Comfort, comfort my people … speak tenderly to Jerusalem…" (Isaiah 40:1-2) is addressed to the gentiles. We are admonished to speak favourably and to comfort Israel. I am a gentile, a born-again Christian, and I know you are really being hit hard — a double whammy – what with terrorist bombings in Israel, increasing anti-Semitism in Europe, the desecration of synagogues and cemeteries, and schools and religious Jews becoming the object of more frequent attacks. Every time I hear of yet another terrorist bombing in some crowded Israeli area, my heart breaks for you.

While I cannot pray for peace in Israel because it is a time for you to fight and defend your nation – any other country, if it were being so afflicted would do the same – it is biblical to pray for the peace of Jerusalem, the Holy City, and I do so earnestly. I also pray for those of you who live in Israel and elsewhere in the world that you be able to find strength and courage – chazak v'amatz – to endure in these very difficult times.

The State of Israel was "reinstated" in May 1948 – no other nation or tribe of people on earth that disappeared was ever reinstated, save Israel. She will never disappear from the earth again.

The State of Israel is not a series of occupied territories. She is "Eretz Yisroel."

You are loved. God bless Israel.

War crimes, lies and videotapes

By JACK SILVERSTONE

For the better part of a month, the world was bombarded with a vicious lie, replete with misleading video footage, about a massacre perpetrated in Jenin by the Israel Defence Forces. Outlandish allegations made by Palestinian and other Arab propagandists were lapped up by the international media, the United Nations and the European Union. The lie, as Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres put it, is nothing but a blood libel. And we Jews know what that means. Blood libels against Jews have the been the excuse for centuries for anti-Jewish edicts, expulsions and pogroms.

That big lie has now been exposed, but in a world full of double and even triple standards, one should not, I suppose, expect that Israel would get an apology for the libel against it. Nor do I expect there will be any recognition for Israel's scrupulous adherence to its principle of "purity of arms" and refusal to call in air strikes or artillery to pound the Jenin camp and other centres of terrorist activity. (Instead, it exposed its ground forces to severe losses in order to prevent civilian casualties.)

However, I do expect the media and maybe even some of the world community to be more skeptical of Palestinian claims and not to subscribe so readily to unsubstantiated propaganda of the most vile nature. They should know that the Arabs, unable to defeat Israel on the battlefield, have resorted ever more to the political and juridical fronts, arguing against the legitimacy of Israel itself and its actions in self-defence.

War crimes and crimes against humanity have indeed been committed in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, but not by Israel. The U.S.-based organization Human Rights Watch now admits that the Palestinian claims of a massacre were unfounded, but – unwilling to admit its mistake without qualification – it says that other activities conducted by Israeli forces in the campaign appear to be war crimes. To accuse the Jewish state in a cavalier fashion of perpetrating such acts as those the Jews were victims of during World War II is a deliberate and unacceptable provocation. Israel and Jews everywhere have every right to be thin-skinned in response to such allegations.

International human rights organizations, the UN and the media should focus, not on false accusations against Israel, but rather on looking for war criminals by examining the role of Yasser Arafat and his Palestinian Authority, and before that, the PLO, over the past four decades (and in particular, over the past two years).

The use of disguised terrorists to strike at the Israeli civilian population and Jews worldwide has been a hallmark of Palestinian terrorism, and it did not start with the current so-called intifadah. It predates the establishment of the State of Israel and has never been absent from the conflict. To recruit suicide bombers to attack the civilian population in Israel is criminal. The perpetuation of terrorism violates numerous international treaties and conventions. To use children, as they do, as unlawful combatants contravenes international humanitarian law, as does the use of ambulances to transport terrorists and munitions. To wage a systematic war of aggression through terror is a contravention of international law.

And what of the UN itself? The Jenin refugee camp receives extensive logistical support from the United Nations Relief and Works Authority (UNRWA), a UN entity created specifically to assist Palestinian refugees. How could they turn a blind eye to the transformation of civilian areas, where they have an extensive infrastructure, into armed camps, bomb factories and staging areas for terrorists? UNRWA has a lot to answer for.

It is significant that the new International Criminal Court (ICC), a permanent international criminal tribunal to prosecute and punish war crimes and genocide, came into effect on July 1. The United States is not a party to its formation, nor will it become one, and Israel has expressed serious reservations about its politicization. It is to have a chief prosecutor with enormous powers, elected by secret ballot and without real accountability to state members. The ICC is one of the legacies of the Nuremberg tribunals after the Holocaust and World War II. Sadly, it appears likely that its misuse by some Arab and Muslim states and their supporters will turn it into an instrument for political propaganda and judicial guerrilla warfare.

As we saw last summer in Durban, South Africa, at the so-called World Conference Against Racism, virtually every international forum, regardless of its stated purpose, is being turned into an Israel-bashing, anti-Semitic event. The international legal system, such as it is, is certainly not immune and, unfortunately, may be heading in that direction. Canada, both through the expression of governmental views and through its legal community, must stand up against malevolent manipulation and abuse of the international juridical apparatus.

Jack Silverstone is the executive vice-president and general counsel, Canadian Jewish Congress.

The definition of "war crime" in the ICC statute was expanded to include the movement of populations into occupied territories. Israelis fear this definition will be used against Jewish communities such as Beit El (above) in the West Bank.

Why Israel withdrew support for the new war crimes court

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Despite special assurances it would not be politically targeted by a new war crimes court, Israel has withdrawn its support and will not ratify its signature on the United Nations treaty creating the court, officials said last week.

The world's first permanent war crimes court came into existence July 1 in the Netherlands. The cabinet, following the United States' lead, decided late last month not to join the court even though it had been among countries behind the drive to establish it.

Israel is concerned that an expanded list of war crimes put forward by the International Criminal Court could throw into question the international legality of settlements in the West Bank and Gaza Strip and leave IDF soldiers vulnerable.

"The moment the charter of the court took the shape of a political institution rather than a judicial institution, we could no longer be a part of it," said Justice Ministry spokesperson Yonaton Baker.

Israel's ambassador to the United Nations, Yehuda Lancry, signed the treaty in December 2000, but only after assurances that the court would not be used as a political tool to persecute Israelis. With memories of the Holocaust in mind, Israel had been among the countries pushing for a permanent war crimes court.

Israel's backing withered, however, after those who prepared the framework for the treaty expanded a list of war crimes to include the movement of populations into occupied territories. That could throw into question the future of 200,000 Jews living in more than 140 settlements built on land captured from Egypt and Jordan after the 1967 Six Day War, which is now claimed by the Palestinians for a future state.

The court, located in The Hague, will prosecute those responsible for genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes committed on or after July 1.

The United States is also demanding immunity because it fears American troops and citizens could be targets of frivolous and politically motivated prosecutions. The treaty, signed by 139 countries, was ratified by 74.

Israel originally agreed to sign the declaration after an amendment was added that said Israel was opposed to any attempt to use the treaty's provisions "in a politically motivated manner against Israel and its citizens."

Another Israeli concern over backing the court was that Syria, a party to the treaty, might then be able to file complaints over Israel's settlement of the Golan Heights, a strategic border area Israel captured from Syria in 1967 and annexed in 1981.

"Even though Syria has no authority there, Syria can still possibly press the law," said Irit Kohn, head of the international section of the state's attorney's office. "There are many questions. These things are very unclear."

Kohn, speaking on Army Radio, said that as long as Israel does not ratify the treaty, the court will not have jurisdiction over its territory and the court cannot force Israel to extradite any of its citizens to stand trial in The Hague.

She warned however that it remains to be seen if a wanted Israeli could be arrested when travelling to a country that has signed the treaty.

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon late last month rejected a proposal by Attorney General Elyakim Rubinstein and Minister Dan Meridor to announce that Israel would not participate in the court "at the present time." Foreign Minister Shimon Peres also strongly opposed having Israel participate in the new court.

Prior to the government meeting, Rubinstein sent a letter to cabinet secretary Gideon Saar noting that Justice Minister Meir Sheetrit and other involved officials believe that Israel should not confirm its signature on the international tribunal's constitution.

The attorney general wrote that "the reasons for this are connected to the danger of politicization that threatens the court, and the article that is largely directly against Israel on the matter of settlements." He also noted that "the United States, which Israel followed in signing the court's constitution, officially informed the UN recently that it has no intention of ratifying the covenant."

Meridor, the only one to abstain from the unanimous decision late last month, said that "if this were a fair and apolitical institution, there would be reason to join it."

Our forgotten ally

The other day, a little pamphlet arrived in my mail. Entitled Israel: Democracy's Neglected Ally, it bore the name of an author whom I had known well. He was Pierre van Paassen, whose name was once well known to Jews and Christians alike.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Born in Holland at the end of the 19th century, van Paasen, a non-Jewish American journalist, became one of the most vocal advocates for a Jewish Palestine, and when the dream was fulfilled, he became a staunch defender of the State of Israel.

It was my privilege to know him personally, and I cherish the memory of the evening when he was a dinner guest in our home.

Van Paassen became widely known after he published a controversial book during World War II. Titled The Forgotten Ally, it described the Yishuv's contribution to the anti-Nazi war effort. The ally, he wrote, was the Jewish people, and its contribution to the victory of the Allies over the Nazis was, in van Paassen's words, "the best kept secret of the war."

Van Paasen was also the man who, more than any other I know of, reported Nazi atrocities from Germany, which led to his expulsion from the country. The Toronto Star reported on this on April 24, 1933, showing his face together with Adolf Hitler's. The montage emphasized the stunning similarity between the two faces, yet no greater difference in philosophy could be imagined. The picture had a memorable byline: "Pierre van Paasen is not a Jew."

Over the centuries, we Jews have had more enemies than friends, but that is no reason to neglect the latter. It's high time to remember our friends with affection. Van Paasen published his book in 1943, and, for a while, it topped the best-seller lists. Too bad it has been neglected, and the author's name with it.

The purpose of this column is to stimulate as many readers as possible to go to the nearest library and ask for a book by van Paassen. If you are fortunate enough to borrow a copy, you will have a great experience awaiting you. (I am sad to report that my own copy has mysteriously disappeared.)

Pierre's "forgotten ally" stood for the Jewish people. I hope we can exhume the memory of van Paassen, who died in 1968 and has become our own forgotten ally.

The demographic challenge

If in the past, "Who is a Jew" was debated among the various denominations in the Jewish world, today the debate has shifted inwardly to the domestic Israeli arena.

Last week, the Israeli government rejected a proposed amendment to the Law of Return that would have placed new limitations on immigration to Israel. In a direct response to Nazism's anti-Jewish measures, the law was originally developed to provide automatic refuge and citizenship to anyone with a Jewish grandparent. Although Jewish religious law (Halachah) determines religious affiliation maternally, the law applies to the grandchild of a Jewish grandfather, even if his mother and grandmother are not Jewish. As a result, some 20 per cent (approximately 250,000) of immigrants from the former Soviet Union qualify for Israeli citizenship even though they are non-Jews according to religious law.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

In an effort to limit the number of non-Jewish immigrants, the Shas party's proposed amendment would have limited the ability of those with a Jewish grandfather to enter Israel under the Law of Return, unless the grandfather himself immigrated as well. If accepted, the amendment could have led to complicated, even bizarre scenarios: a Christian priest with a Jewish grandmother and Jewish father might have been covered under the law, despite not being halachically Jewish. In contrast, the Zionist, Hebrew-speaking son of a Jewish father and Jewish grandfather would not be covered by the law if his grandfather was deceased and could not immigrate with him.

The government rightly rejected this clumsy amendment, but the attendant debate pointed to a deeper, discernable trend in the Israeli public discourse – the concern for the country's Jewish majority. Three factors have made this historic concern more pressing in recent months. First, the Russian immigration of the last decade has created a significant minority of non-Jewish citizens who are not Arabs for the first time in Israel's history. Second, the decline in Palestinian workers from the territories has created a growing demand for foreign workers to perform menial jobs. Today, there are more foreign workers than unemployed Israelis.

Finally, the sense that a negotiated agreement with the Palestinians is virtually impossible at present has revived "the demographic question." When nearly 20 per cent of Israelis are either Arabs or other non-Jews, preservation of a Jewish majority necessitates tough choices with regard to the Palestinians in the territories. The arguments are known and the alternatives are stark: If prolonged reoccupation is necessary for security reasons, Israel can maintain a Jewish majority over time only by denying the Palestinians full civil rights or by somehow removing them from the area. Neither of these options is palatable to most Israelis.

In the absence of easy prospects for negotiations, it is not surprising that people are drawn to extreme responses. Prof. Danny Gottwein of Haifa University recently distinguished between two kinds of separation – territorial and national. As clear-cut territorial separation with the Palestinians seems more distant due to current security imperatives, the more elusive option of national separation appears to be taking hold. By definition, it is difficult to implement such a principle without the appearance or reality of discrimination on ethnic or religious grounds. This, in turn, hits at the very core of Israel's identity as a Jewish and democratic state.

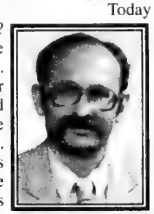
There is no simple resolution for these existential questions. Both left and right wing in the political debate use the demographic argument to reinforce their respective positions on the territories. At the same time, the changed demographic reality inside Israel has spawned some initiatives that would have been unheard of in the past. For example, last month, a private member's bill to allow civil marriage for those Israeli residents precluded from religious marriages was reintroduced in the Knesset. In a country in which only religious marriage is permitted (for members of any religion), non-Jewish Russian citizens who serve in the army and fulfil other duties of citizenship are unable to marry in Israel and have been forced to do so abroad.

These issues are far too critical to be left only to rabbis or legislators with political agendas. Regardless of the next steps with the Palestinians, these are critical questions for Israelis themselves. A broad public debate is required to determine identity and practice for the country in the decades to come.

Going to summer camp

Any study of Jewish identity in North America has to recognize the key role played by Jewish summer camps. They have been a major force in the socialization of Jewish children.

What is Jewish about these camps? In fact, the range is impressive. Some camps are only minimally Jewish. These are mainly private summer camps where most of the campers and staff are Jewish, and the food may be kosher or kosher style. And that is all. Others are Jewish community camps of various sorts, where almost all the kids and staff are Jewish, the food is usually kosher, some Shabbat ceremonies or observances are practised, and periodic doses of Jewish content are included in the program.



Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

At the other end of the spectrum are religious camps where Jewish learning takes place, or Zionist camps with explicit elements of Zionist or Israeli programming. Both of these would also use Hebrew words and sing Hebrew songs, religious or secular.

This summer, one hopes there will be a new priority on the programming agenda of Jewish summer camps. At this critical moment facing Israel, one hopes that these camps, especially those with ties to Jewish communities or movements – will try to increase the Israel component of their programming. Indeed, as high school trips to Israel are cancelled, the summer camps must serve as surrogate Israels for many Jewish teens. Indeed, some of the communal funding earmarked for Israel programming might be deliberately diverted to summer camps. Fun should remain paramount. But it is possible to combine fun with the creation of a strong pro-Jewish and pro-Israel identity.

Today Jewish camps range from the very posh to the rather Spartan. Some community camps have scholarships for low-income families. At the other end of the spectrum, many Jewish camps have to compete with highly specialized camps that cater to affluent families, featuring things like computer workshops, the latest in photography and film, tennis or sports specialties, artistic expression and the like. Some of these fancy-schmancy or specialty camps are less places for kids to relax and "chill," and more continuations of the pressures of school and the need for extra-curricular achievement. Yet kids seem to like them, and they pose a challenge to the more generalized Jewish camp.

One hears that enrolment figures in Canadian Jewish summer camps remain strong. I hope this is true, although it would be remarkable, since an increasing number of Canadian Jewish youths seem to be going to American camps, either as campers or to work as counsellors or specialists.

One of the ongoing debates among Jewish researchers is the degree to which a Jewish summer camp experience is effective, compared to Jewish schooling, Jewish family life, or trips to Israel, in inculcating Jewish identity. The little research that exists shows a positive association between summer camp experiences and subsequent measures of Jewish identity, though it is hard to estimate if one kind of Jewish input works "better" than another. Certainly, for those Jewish children who have little formal Jewish schooling and a minimally Jewish home, a Jewish summer camp experience may be crucial.

But it is not surprising that the camps have some positive effect on later Jewishness. How could they not? The campers are away from the supervision of nagging parents and the routine of school and homework, out in the country and fresh air. Camp activities are usually varied enough – sports, swimming, hiking, arts and crafts, music, drama—that most kids find something they really enjoy. Hormones are raging. So anything associated with that fun experience – it being a Jewish camp – is seen positively.

I attended a Hebrew-speaking camp, Camp Massad, in the Laurentian mountains north of Montreal, eight years as a camper and two as a counsellor. I speak for many other "Massadniks" of the 1950s and 1960s who would confirm the impact of that experience on their subsequent Jewish commitments.

For those Jewish camps that are co-ed, the importance of the social scene cannot be underestimated. I would love to get some global estimate of the numbers of Jewish marriages that have taken place in North America between people who met at summer camp. And even where there are no marriages, many young Jews get their first taste of romance and dating in summer camp – with a Jewish partner. That is as crucial a foundation as any for Jewish continuity.

The Kirshner File

A cornucopia of books...

Summer's long, lazy days beckon readers with an outpouring of new, eclectic books for all tastes...

In terms of emotional and historical resonance, Israel's capture of eastern Jerusalem was one of the highlights of the Six Day War, the 35th anniversary of which was marked last month. The late Mordechai Gur, who commanded Israeli forces in Jerusalem, wrote an informative account of that moment – The Battle for Jerusalem – in 1974. The English version, ably translated by Philip Gillon and published by ibooks, is now out in print.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

What accounts for the fact that the proportion of Christians living in the Middle East has dropped significantly in the past century? American foreign correspondent Charles Sennott grapples with this issue in The Body and the Blood (HarperCollins), a journalistic pilgrimage based on visits to Israel, Lebanon and Egypt, where Christian flight is most apparent.

Kathleen Christison, a former CIA analyst, has a bone to pick with U.S. foreign policy in the Mideast. In Perceptions of Palestine (University of California Press), a pro-Palestinian tract, she claims that the United States has never had a balanced policy. Rather than addressing the needs of both sides, she argues in this historical survey, Washington has focused on Israel's security requirements to the exclusion of other issues and has thus failed to bring the peace process to a successful conclusion.

Said Aburish, a seasoned Palestinian writer, excoriates Yasser Arafat, president of the Palestinian Authority, in Arafat: From Defender to Dictator (Raincoast Books). His thesis is that Arafat has been corrupted by power, is out of touch with reality and has become just another Arab dictator.

Since the horrific events of Sept. 11, Islam has been much in the news. In Islam: A Concise Introduction (HarperCollins), Huston Smith offers an explanation of its mass appeal and deals with such timely topics as the meaning of jihad and the growth of Islam in the United States.

Jews were profoundly influenced by eight centuries of Persian, Greek and Roman domination. Seth Schwartz delves into this intriguing aspect of the Jewish experience in a masterful book, Imperialism and Jewish Society, 200 B.C.E to 640 C.E. (Princeton University Press).

Although Palestine was the cradle of Jewish culture, the Jews of classical antiquity dwelled mainly in Greece, Egypt, Syria, Mesopotamia and Asia Minor. In Diaspora: Jews Amidst Greeks and Romans (Harvard University Press), Erich Gruen deftly explores their lives, their institutions and the sporadic harassment to which they were subjected.

Judaism is supposedly indifferent, even hostile, to the visual arts. But in The Artless Jew: Medieval and Modern Affirmations and Denials of the Visual (Princeton University Press), Kalman Bland overturns the assumption of Jewish iconophobia.

Shmuley Boteach, author of Kosher Sex, turns his attention to the basics in Judaism for Everyone (HarperCollins), an engaging primer in which Judaism is portrayed as a faith attuned to the needs of modern life. A companion volume, Rekindling the Faith (Harcourt), by Samuel Osherson, is written for assimilated, intermarried and non-observant Jews interested in making Judaism a part of their lives.

Marriage, one of the key commandments in Judaism, is sealed by a marriage contract. Ketubbot (Pomegranate) presents 40 beautifully decorated marriage contracts from the Jewish Museum in New York.

Proverbs: The Wisdom of Solomon (Random House), translated and introduced by Rabbi Rami Shapiro, is a book of pithy aphorisms, the key themes of which run from self-discipline to personal integrity.

Is the Torah letter-perfect? Barry Levy's Fixing God's Torah (Oxford University Press) examines this complex question through a meticulous examination of rabbinic writings.

Due to its connection with Purim, the Book of Esther is one of the most enjoyed books of the Bible. Adele Berlin, in Esther (Jewish Publication Society), provides a line-by-line commentary of this biblical text. Bruce Feiler, in Walking the Bible (HarperCollins), walks a reader through the five books of Moses, an arduous trek through five countries that magically connects biblical stories to actual sites.

Hebrew manuscripts are a window into Jewish intellectual, religious and everyday life in the Middle Ages. Hebrew Manuscripts of the Middle Ages (Cambridge University Press), by Colette Sirat, is the last word on this topic.

Judaica meets Americana in Judaikitsch: Tchotschkes, Schmattes and Noshere (Raincoast Books), a funky, off-kilter collection of crafts and collectibles for every (?) home.

Yale University's user-friendly Modern English-Hebrew Dictionary, edited by Avraham Zilkha, contains 30,000 entries and includes newly-coined words, contemporary technical expressions and common idioms.

Isaac Babel (1894-1940) is one of the greatest writers of the 20th century, and his legacy grows by the year. The Complete Works of Isaac Babel, edited by his daughter Nathalie and introduced by Cynthia Ozick, has been published by W.W. Norton & Company.

The One Facing Us (Fitzhenry & Whiteside), Ronit Matalon's impressive first novel in English, is set in Israel, Africa and the United States, charged with family history and animated by the mysteries of cultural exile.

Neurotica (Bantam Books) is most unusual – a book by Jewish writers, ranging from Saul Bellow and Isaac Bashevis Singer to Henry Roth and Jerzy Kosinski, on every conceivable dimension of sex.

Hasia Diner investigates a subject the vast majority of scholars completely ignore: the culinary habits of new immigrants. In Hungering for America (Harvard University Press), she zeroes in on the changing food habits of three such groups – Jews, Italians and Irish – and does so with generous dollops of panache.

Maya Plisetskaya, a Jewish prima ballerina during the Soviet era, has written her memoirs. I, Maya Plisetskaya (Yale University Press), is quite interesting, but curiously enough, she alludes to her Jewish background only very indirectly.

Holocaust survivors continue to bear witness. Vera Schiff, in Hitler's Inferno (Raj Publishing), poignantly describes the fate of eight people, relatives and friends, during the nightmare of the Holocaust.

No One Awaiting Me (University of Calgary Press), by Joil Alpern, is the inspirational story of two orphaned brothers whose grit enabled them to survive the Holocaust in Romania. Reclaiming the Past, by Emery Gregus (self-published), vividly recreates the shoah as it unfolded in Hungary. Hanna's Diary, 1938-1941 (McGill-Queen's University Press), by Hanna Spencer, touches on the Holocaust in Czechoslovakia from a very personal vantage point. Light from the Ashes (The University of Michigan Press), edited by Peter Suedfeld, assesses the impact of the Holocaust on young survivors with respect to their personalities, values and choice of careers. First Words (Fitzhenry & Whiteside), by Rosetta Loy, describes the Holocaust in Italy from the viewpoint of an observant, empathetic Catholic girl. The Avengers (Alfred A. Knopf), by Rich Cohen, turns on a band of Jewish partisans in Vilna, led by Abba Kovner, who battled the Germans, hatched a plan to kill Nazis and fought for Israel in the War of Independence.

There are no shortage of Holocaust deniers, from Ernst Zundel to David Irving, and Denying History (University of California Press), by Michael Shermer and Alex Grobman, takes a close look at them.

The men who conceived and orchestrated the Holocaust, ranging from Hermann Goering to Heinrich Himmler, are thoroughly profiled by Guido Knopp in Hitler's Henchmen (Oxford University Press). Goebbels (Harcourt Brace), Ralf Georg Reuth's vivid biography of Joseph Goebbels, Nazi Germany's minister of propaganda, plumbs a black soul. Speer: The Final Verdict (HarperCollins), Joachim Fest's biography of Albert Speer, Adolf Hitler's architect and minister of armaments, analyzes a man of immense contradictions. Hitler and the Holocaust (Random House), by Robert Wistrich, is a superb example of the historian's craft. Hitler Stopped by Franco (Marbella House), by Jane and Burt Boyar, posits the theory that Spain's strongman, Francisco Franco, played an indirect role in Germany's defeat and the rescue of 60,000 Jewish refugees. Social Outsiders in Nazi Germany (Princeton University Press) concentrates on so-called undesirables, from Jews to homosexuals, that Hitler's regime sought to exterminate. The erudite essays in this excellent volume are edited by Robert Gellately and Nathan Stoltzfus, both of whom are experts on Nazi Germany.

War Crimes of the Deutsche Bank and the Dresdner Bank (Holmes & Meier), edited by Christopher Simpson, is an illuminating, jolting study of two large German banks during the infamy of the Third Reich. Michael Burleigh's The Third Reich: A New History (Hill and Wang) is a magisterial analysis of Nazi Germany from every conceivable angle. Read it and cringe. The Man Who Invented the Third Reich (Sutton), by Stan Lauryssens, is a discerning biography of Arthur Moeller van den Bruck, a now-obscure person who greatly influenced Hitler.

Jewish Life

An ongoing message

By RACHAEL TURKIENIEZ

The fast of Tisha b'Av is approaching and it is important to ask ourselves why we are told to fast. Certainly the historic answer is the usual one: both the first and the second Temples were destroyed on this day, and therefore we fast as a sign of mourning.

Likewise, all the fast periods that surround these months are connected to historical events. For example, we fast on the date we believe the walls of Jerusalem were breached (17th of Tammuz). All these fasts are linked to events that ultimately end in the destruction of the Temples and the exile of the Jewish people from their homeland.

Though Tisha b'Av sits amid other fasts that connect to a historical progression (the Temple fasts), it stands out from them because it is considered a major fast – in other words, it lasts 24 hours. It is unusual in Judaism to enact a major fast merely because it marks a past event.

The rabbis of the Talmud generally discourage fasting and criticize those who engage in too many personal fasts. When we are told to refrain from eating and drinking, it is most often in order to repent so that we can improve ourselves. Sometimes specific contemporary events will call for a fast in order to avert a disaster. Rarely do we engage in a fast simply to mark a historical event, and even more rarely would that fast last for 24 hours. So why do we fast on Tisha b'Av?

Perhaps the answer lies in the writings of the prophets, particularly Jeremiah. On Tisha b'Av we read Jeremiah's book of Lamentations, which describes the ruins of Jerusalem and the devastation brought upon the people. Jeremiah lived in the time of the first Temple, and despite his repeated and lengthy warnings, the Israelites refused to consider the possibility that they could lose it all. Jeremiah bore witness to the truth of his prophecies when he lived through the events. We hear his heart breaking in the book's words.

It is true we mourn the loss of the Temples and the ensuing exile. But we also mourn our own ignorance in not heeding any of the warnings. We are taught in Jewish law that before anyone can be found guilty of a capital crime, it must be proved that they were warned and committed the act with full knowledge. We lost the Temple, we lost everything, because we were warned and we remained deaf.

Jeremiah was a prophet who was well aware of the politics of his time. His warnings included theological messages as well as political ones. Sometimes the words of prophecy serve to clarify logical consequences. Today we would say that we failed to "read the handwriting on the wall."

We fast on Tisha b'Av, not because we are marking history, but because we are hoping to learn from it. It is not a mere anniversary but an ongoing warning. The midrash relates a passage where God goes to Jerusalem as it lies in ruins. The ministering angels are accompanying Him and Jeremiah is leading the way. Upon seeing the ruins and the desolation, God weeps and cries out in anguish: "My children, where are you? My priests, My Levites, where are you? What else could I do... I kept warning you again and again."

Why Israel searches ambulances

MYTH:

Israel prevents Palestinian ambulances from taking sick and injured Palestinians to hospitals.

FACT:

One of the unfortunate results of the violence during the current intifadah has been the allegations of Israeli abuse against Palestinian Red Crescent ambulances. Various human rights groups, and politicians throughout the Arab world, have accused Israel of gratuitously delaying ambulances attempting to cross from the West Bank into Israel proper, resulting in inconveniences, medical complications, and even death to the sick passengers on board. These accounts tend to portray the delays as wanton acts of cruelty on the part of Israeli soldiers against Palestinians in need of medical attention.

These allegations are correct in one regard: ambulances are indeed stopped and searched at Israeli checkpoints. They fail, however, to put the facts into a broader context. The reason that ambulances have been held and searched at checkpoints is due to the very real threat that they pose to Israel and its citizens. Ambulances have frequently been used as a means to transport terrorist bombs, and many of the militants who have triggered suicide bombings in Israel gained access by driving or riding in Red Crescent ambulances.

For example: On May 17, 2002, an explosive belt was found in a Red Crescent ambulance at a checkpoint near Ramallah. The bomb, the same type generally used in suicide bombings, was hidden under a gurney on which a sick child was lying. The driver, Islam Jibril, was already wanted by the Israel Defence Forces (IDF), and he admitted that this was not the first time that an ambulance had been used to transport explosives or terrorists. According to Jibril, he was given the bomb by Mahmoud Titi, a member of the al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades, which the U.S. State Department has listed as a terrorist organization and which is affiliated with Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat's Fatah movement.

The bomb was removed from the ambulance and detonated in the presence of a representative of the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC). In a statement issued the same day, the ICRC said it "understands the security concerns of the Israeli authorities, and has always acknowledged their right to check ambulances, provided it does not unduly delay medical evacuations." Soldiers escorted the ambulance's sick passengers to a nearby hospital.

In January 2002, Wafa Idris blew herself up on crowded Jaffa Street in Jerusalem, becoming one of the first female suicide bombers. She was an ambulance driver for the Palestinian Red Crescent, as was Mohammed Hababa, the Tanzim operative who sent her on her mission. Idris left the West Bank by way of an ambulance.

In October 2001, Nidal Nazal, a Hamas operative in Kalkilya, was arrested by the IDF. He was an ambulance driver for the Palestinian Red Crescent, and information indicates that he exploited his privileges of unrestricted travel to serve as a messenger between the Hamas headquarters in several West Bank towns.

The accusations levelled against Israel by its critics have frequently been based on statements of international law, such as the Fourth Geneva Convention. It is true that the Geneva Convention does place particular emphasis on the immunity and neutrality of ambulances and emergency medical personnel. But the conclusion that Israel must ignore a clear and present danger to its citizens, or else violate international law, is a distortion. It is in fact the Palestinian terrorists, who are using ambulances to smuggle explosives into Israel, that are compromising the Red Crescent's immunity and neutrality.

Jewish Life

Tisha b'Av & acts of kindness

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

We are now in the period called The Three Weeks, the traditional time of mourning when we remember the destruction of the Temples and other Jewish catastrophes that have occurred on Tisha b'Av.

Sometimes it may be hard to relate to disasters that happened 2,000 years ago. But the Talmud makes those events feel relevant when it explains that the Second Temple was destroyed because of sinat chinam, baseless hatred between Jews. The story is told of a man named Bar-Kamtza who was mistakenly invited to a feast. When the error was discovered, Bar-Kamtza was humiliated and told to leave. In return, Bar-Kamtza became an informant to Caesar. [http://www.ou.org/yerushalayim/tishabav/kamtza.htm]

As the Ohr Somayach Web site illustrates, baseless hatred is unfortunately an all too modern phenomenon. For example, how many people who feel wronged in an inheritance choose to drag the case through the courts just to make sure the other side gets nothing? The site illustrates this hatred with the following parable: A king told a person, "Ask for anything you desire and I'll give it to you, and to your enemy I'll give double." After thinking awhile he said, "O, King, poke out one of my eyes." [http://www.ohr.org.il/special/9av/tishabav.htm]

Of course, there is much good out there, too. And many wonderful sites on the Internet that focus on gemilut chasadim, acts of kindness, and ahavat chinam, acts of selfless love. As Tisha b'Av approaches, here are some of my favourites.

The Adat Shalom Reconstructionist Congregation in Bethesda, Md., provides guidelines for three of the central acts of gemilut chesed: visiting the sick (bikur cholim), hospitality (hachnasat orchim) and comforting the mourner (nichum avelim.) As the page says, "Gemilut chesed is, in the final analysis, an individual act and an individual expression of how we view the world in which we live... In performing acts of gemilut chesed, we seek to unify our historic communal and individual experiences by enhancing our individual personal development as Jews, as members of the present generation of the Jewish people, and as members of the human family." [http://www.jrf.org/adatsmd/gemiched.html]

Rabbi Rami Shapiro explains that gemilut chasadim means putting other people first. But he emphasizes that this "does not mean denigrating yourself or denying yourself happiness. It means taking the other person into account and seeing how what you say and do impacts on those around you." He says that putting the other person first will become natural, but here are some suggestions to get into the swing of things:

- Praise helpful employees to their managers.
- Reply courteously to unsolicited sales calls over the phone.
- Take care of the things that take care of you. Kindness is not simply toward people. The things in your life serve you tirelessly. Maintain your car. Polish your shoes. [http://shlk.com/107]

There are several Web sites that speak about random acts of kindness, doing the unexpected to bring joy into the lives of others [http://www.actsofkindness.org/pdf/teachers_guide.pdf] Miriam Scheibein writes in the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism's La Nasi that she has a problem with the "random" factor. "As Jews, we are commanded to visit the sick, clothe the naked, honour the elderly, give tzedakah, and perform gemilut chasadim, acts of loving kindness. Thus, these acts are not random; they are obligations." [http://www.usy.org/yourusy/communications/lanasi/pdf/1997winter.pdf]

Alan Feder was forced to be kind – and he thinks it was a good idea. Feder is a student at Ramaz Upper School in Manhattan, where he and his classmates are required to perform 40 hours of chesed. He feels that many of his classmates who normally put in nine-hour school days wouldn't find time to volunteer unless it was required. But many enjoyed it so much that they continued to volunteer even after the program was finished. [http://www.thejewishweek.com/bottom/freshink_content.php3?artid=102]

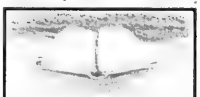
Commemorating Tisha b'Av

By RABBI MARTIN J. BERMAN

Soon we will be commemorating Tisha b'Av, when we mourn the destruction of the First and Second Temples. Our ancient sages believed that the cause of the destruction of the Second Temple was sinat chinam (senseless hatred). Josephus, in his history of the period, writes about the various groups among the population and adds weight to the rabbis' analysis of the events. The Jewish people were divided and fought among themselves. He notes that Jews were killing Jews while the Romans stood outside the walls of Jerusalem.



In contrast to this reality was the ideal that all of Israel is responsible one for the other. We are not isolated individuals, but we are part of a whole known as the people of Israel. The concept is wonderful, but the reality is something else. We are not united, and not even threats to the existence of the State of Israel are enough to truly bring us all together. Our political differences, our religious differences, our ethnic differences all too often stand in the way of truly relating as one people.

This is not new. From the days of the Second Temple to modern times, we have been a people divided. The question is not how to eliminate the divisions – that is impossible – but how to live with them. How do we acknowledge that we are one while we also hold divergent views on life?

I have recently become president of the Toronto Board of Rabbis (TBR). The TBR is made up of rabbis from every denominational group. There are Orthodox, Conservative, Reconstructionist and Reform rabbis who participate in this body. We do not think alike, we do not act alike and we do not always agree on the important issues. But we do sit together, we do talk together and we do respect each other, no matter what divides us, because we firmly believe that what unites us is more important than what divides us.

Ours is not a perfect model. We can't always act on behalf of our religious constituencies the way we would like because of those differences. Yet, it is important to note that we often can come together to serve the entire Jewish community, especially during times of crisis such the one we are in now.

I wish that we could find a way to bring together more of the rabbinic community of Toronto to share in the common effort, but I understand that this will not come to be. But I do ask that the general Jewish community urge its rabbinic leadership to be involved in efforts that will unite us. We do not have to agree on the religious positions of others. But we do have to recognize that our strength as a community is fostered by our coming together, and we are weakened when we can not even sit together and talk.

Rabbi Martin J. Berman is spiritual leader of Shaar Shalom Synagogue in Thornhill, Ont.

Child survivors to gather in Toronto in October

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Among child survivors of the Holocaust, Eve Bergstein's experiences were not altogether unique. Nevertheless, they entail the kind of drama and plot twists that no Hollywood script writer could imagine.

Born in Staszow, Poland, a small town southeast of Warsaw, Bergstein was only five years old when the Nazi hammer fell. Fearing arrest by German forces, her parents handed her to a Roman Catholic couple who lived on a farm and who promised to take care of her. She stayed there, along with two young cousins, until workers on the farm betrayed them to the Gestapo.

The host family, hearing that the Gestapo was about to swoop down on them, hurriedly took the youngsters, who ranged in age from four to six, to a nearby convent and turned them over to the Catholic sisters.

Bergstein remained in the convent for three years, terrified of telling anyone she was really Jewish. During that time, she was separated from her cousins, who were caught and killed by the Nazis.

Near the end of the war, Bergstein herself was almost killed when the convent was bombed and she was caught under a pile of rubble. Luckily, the family that had placed her at the convent learned of the bombing and came to extricate her from the debris. She was taken in by the family and lived with them for one year until her uncle, who had survived Auschwitz but whose two children had been killed, found her and took her into his care.

Eventually he arranged for Bergstein to be reunited with her aunt, Rivka Applebaum, in Toronto while he emigrated to Brazil, where his uncle resided.

Now 65, Bergstein has told her story many times to school children attending Holocaust awareness programs. She's also an active participant in a local chapter of the World Federation of Jewish Child Survivors of the Holocaust.

Bergstein, along with Anita Ekstein, another child survivor, serve as co-chairs of the group's 11th annual International Child Survivors Conference, which will be held in Toronto from Friday, Oct. 11 to Monday, Oct. 14 at the Regal Constellation Hotel. Staged only for the second time in Canada – Montreal hosted the 1994 event – organizers are encouraging participants to sign up before the Aug. 1 early registration deadline.

The conference will feature numerous workshops, seminars and keynote speakers. Rabbi Dow Marmur and psychiatrist Robert Krell, both child survivors, are keynote speakers. Madame Justice Rosalie Abella and author Lev Raphael, who are children of survivors, will also address the conference.

The Toronto conference, whose theme is "Sharing the Past, Celebrating Life," serves an important function in the lives of child survivors, Bergstein said.

"It's an opportunity to meet other people who had a similar life experience. It's very important for child survivors. We do not have a community of survivors like older people did. We were younger and were more interested in becoming Canadians."

Many child survivors did not have friends who shared similar experiences and did not have anyone to discuss the kind of unique traumatic issues that concerned them, Bergstein said.

Many continue to be troubled by questions of identity. Though born Jewish, they were hidden in non-Jewish homes and convents and subsequently had very little contact with the Jewish community, she said.

The 1991 conference in New York, which drew 1,600 people, was attended by about 20 women from Poland who had been told only late in life that they were born Jewish.

"Their mothers are saying to them, on their deathbeds, that they were Jews," Bergstein said.

Two such women from Poland and one from Croatia will likely attend the Toronto conference, she added.

A total of 350 people from around the world are expected at the Toronto conference. Since the first conference in 1991, the World Federation of Jewish Child Survivors of the Holocaust (www.fjcsh.org) has expanded to 48 chapters around the world. They have held meetings in Prague, Jerusalem, Los Angeles, Houston, Seattle, Washington and Miami.

Cost of the Toronto conference is $350, which includes all meals and materials.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I am very concerned about my teenage daughter. She has stopped eating meat and poultry and I am worried that she isn't getting any protein. What other sources of protein are there?

A. Eggs, dairy products, soy, fish and a grain called quinoa are all complete sources of protein. Other sources that are incomplete proteins include nuts and legumes (i.e. chick peas, kidney beans, lentils etc.).

Q. My daughter is nine months old and I know that she can now eat egg yolks. Is it okay for her to have raw egg yolks? I make a sauce for pasta with raw yolks.

A. No. While it is okay for her to have egg yolks now, they must be fully cooked to prevent food poisoning.

Q. My daughter has always loved grapes and eats them daily. She really gets mad when I cut them up, because she thinks they look like much more fun whole. She is now 2½. Until what age should I continue to cut them?

A. In order to prevent dangerous choking, you should continue to cut her grapes and other round foods until age four. Good for you for sticking to it; it's so important.

Nili Kopstick, manager of product training for RBC Global Services, holds up the black and gold house dress she wore in the international fashion show at the Royal Bank's recent cultural event for its employees. Kopstick is standing in the Jewish/Israeli booth she helped to run.

Royal Bank festival celebrates diversity

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Special to The CJN

Nili Kopstick stands behind a table laiden with Shabbat finery – challah, candlesticks, wine and Jewish specialties like rugalach. Suddenly, a woman walks by the table and grabs a knish. But rather than being distressed, Kopstick encourages the woman to continue noshing. "Oh yeah – eat, eat!" Kopstick tells her in typical Jewish mother fashion.

While Kopstick may be acting like a typical Jewish mother, this is far from a typical Shabbat meal. But it is a celebration of sorts – Royal Bank's third annual cultural event, on June 21 in downtown Toronto, was a festival for employees featuring booths and entertainment from 17 countries, including the Philippines, Italy, Poland and Africa.

Aside from featuring Shabbat-related items, the Jewish/Israeli booth, which Kopstick helped run, also displayed brochures about Israel and Israeli products. But while the booth offered passers-by a window into Shabbat and the opportunity to learn about Israel, it gave no hint of the conflict ravaging the Jewish State.

"It is not a political event," explained Reuven Rashkovsky, senior manager in the Royal Bank's risk management group, in an interview before the event.

"It is cultural, for people to display their ethnic food, singing and dancing."

This sharing of customs and traditions is vital, said Paya Khondo, a booth volunteer and systems analyst at the bank.

"It is important to show (that) people can live and work together from different cultures."

In addition to being a type of cultural exchange, the event was meant to display the diversity of the bank's workforce, Rashkovsky said.

"It is for people at the bank to demonstrate we are all equal and the bank provides equal employment opportunity."

The festival was also a good venue for highlighting Israel's attributes, said Kopstick, manager of product training for RBC Global Services. "Because of what is going on, we wanted to focus on the beauty of Israel and how productive she is," Kopstick said.

Two young women sang Israeli songs part way through the day, and Kopstick participated in the event's international fashion show, wearing a long black and gold house dress typically worn by Israeli women from Middle Eastern countries.

Yiddish concert draws over 1,000 people

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Despite the recent Toronto heat wave, more than 1,000 people attended the Summer Yiddish Concert at the Beth Tikvah Synagogue.

Sponsored by the Committee for Yiddish at UJA Federation, with support from the Toronto Arts Council, the 32nd annual concert, titled Between Two Worlds: Yiddish Songs in Europe and North America, confirmed that Yiddish is alive and well in Toronto.

"The Yiddish summer concert was started as a way of bringing our Yiddish language and culture as part of our Jewish heritage to the community," said Bess Shockett, chair of the concert committee. "What better way to do it than through music?"

Many come to hear a Yiddish vort, she added.

"We have attracted thousands of people, young and old through these concerts which have been held in different parts of the city."

The program presented refreshing and creative interpretations of traditional and post-modern klezmer music, with Russian, Jamaican, Romanian, Spanish and other world sounds incorporated into what was once considered standard klezmer.

From the lively opening instrumental, Dem Tsadik's Zemerl, by Eric Stein's klezmer ensemble Beyond the Pale, the audience clapped delightedly and sang along to the music.

Stein, a leading figure in Toronto's Jewish music scene, played his arrangements on the mandolin and cimbalom. He was joined by Bogdan Djukic on violin and percussion, Bret Higgins on bass, Milos Popovic on accordion and Martin Van de Ven on clarinet.

Vocalists Bronna Levy, Stella Walker, and Dave Wall also performed.

Following the opening remarks by the evening's MC, David Abramowitz, the three singers joined Beyond the Pale in a rendition of Itsik Manger's Hey Klezmorim.

Levy, who has appeared in a variety of leading and supporting roles for the Yiddish Theatre of the Sadie Bronfman Centre, sang the gentle and lilting Di Goldene Pave (the Golden Peacock) from a poem by Anna Margolin and with music by Chava Alberstein, as well as spirited renditions of Mordecai Gebertig's 'Kum Leybke Tantsn (Come Leybke dance) and the calypso-style Yanek's Chasene (Yanek's Wedding), which the audience received enthusiastically.

Walker, who came to Toronto from Vancouver a decade ago, has been active in the Yiddish/klezmer revival and has appeared with many klezmer bands. The singer, who is also an actress and comedian who has appeared on CBC and the Comedy Network, performed Ich Hob Dikh Tsufil Lib and the Bagelman Sisters' (later known as the Barry Sister) hit song Sheyn Vi Di Levone.

Continuing in the Barry Sister's tradition, Levy joined Walker in the moving Eyshes Chayil by composers Isadore Lillian and Joseph Rumshinsky. Yugoslavian violinist Djukic, who came to Canada in 1999 and has performed klezmer, Yiddish, Serbian folk and Mexican mariachi music, joined Walker in a memorable performance of the German classic-style song Harbstlid.

Wall, a member of the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band who has composed and performed music for many film and television productions, performed Vander Ich Mir Lustig and the gypsy sounding Grine Bleter.

Susan Jackson brought greetings from the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and noted the many programs presented by the federation's Committee for Yiddish throughout the year – Yiddish classes for adults and children, lectures, concerts and participation in Holocaust Education Week.

She noted the efforts of Ethel Sum Cooper, chair of the Committee for Yiddish and the work of the event's committee members.

Cooper said support for Yiddish culture in Toronto is strong and "the time is now right to charge ahead with the creation of the Toronto Yiddish Education and Cultural Centre, a Committee for Yiddish project that has been quietly in the works for the last few years."
